Mr. President, let us not be unmindful that stability in railway securities is becoming more and more important in this country every day. Public securities are rapidly passing away. If no interruption comes to our national peace and prosperity for a few years our national debt will have disappeared. No United States bonds will then supply lodging places for the surplus capital of our people. So, too, are the State debts melting away. Economy and prudent administration can and doubtless will retire the State bonds which now afford opportunities for the investment of many millions of our people's money. Every United States and State bond retired brings us nearer to the time when some other kind of security must offer safety and stability to our constantly swelling volume of surplus capital. We are making more money than can profitably be used in the productive industries and desirable improvements of the country. If we drive it into the former, overproduction will result. If we divide it between the two, we supplement overproduction with recklessness in improvements, and surely will reach disaster. But, force it as much as we may, it will not all go in the direction and to the uses indicated. There always will be hundreds of millions seeking more or less permanent investment, with no inconsiderable proportion needing a class of securities which may be readily converted into money. A people whose annual increase of wealth amounts to about $1,000,000,000 must have some kind of convenient securities which will answer the ends here indicated, to say nothing of the demands for such obligations by trust funds, temporary investments, and other uses known to our current financial affairs; and as our public policy, both national and State, is rapidly retiring the securities which possess the characteristic of absolute safety, we should do our utmost to provide a substitute of as nearly like character as the possibilities of the case will admit of.

It would not be wise to force our people to look to foreign securities; for this would complicate their financial conditions with the uncertainties constantly present in European international, political, and monetary affairs, and which might in time involve this country in controversies with the nations of the Old World leading to a disruption of our peaceful relations with them. On all accounts it is best for us to keep this possible element of discord and danger out of our case. We already have advanced far enough to see that as this nation goes on in its future activities and developments it will have quite enough to do in taking care of its own concerns without seeking either political or financial entanglements with other countries. And when we consider in this connection what the history of other nations demonstrates, that financial complications are in the forefront as causes of international disturbances, we should be ready and willing to avoid any course of action tending to lead us into them. Our policies in this regard should be American; and of such organization and action as will afford our people home opportunities for the use and investment of the free capital of their vast and rapidly increasing wealth. A conservative regard for the means within our possession will lead us into safe ways for reaching this most desirable end; and it will be prudent for us to consider whether or not the field of railway securities is not a promising one for us to enter upon in our endeavors to supply some class of securities to take the place of United States and State bonds as they pass away and ultimately disappear from the financial convenience and uses of our people. They represent the most potent factor in our commerce among the several States. That commerce is vast, and is steadily advancing in ratio of increase bordering on the marvelous. It is a source of supply seemingly exhaustless. It embraces all of the industries of our people and all that they produce. Put it and these and that forceful factor which our railway securities represent into the harmonious relations which contentment with each other is sure to induce, and we will have made a long stride on the line of duty of supplying something to take the place of our disappearing public securities.

How can this be done? It is demonstrated that it can not be done by present methods. The failure which has attended the efforts of the railway corporations to put harmony and stability into their system proves that they can not do it, and many of their practices show that they do not mean to do it if left free to pursue their own ways. They have entered upon fields which do not belong to them. They have adopted methods of administration which produce friction and discord. They have forgotten that it is their duty to attend to their own business and to let all other classes of business alone. They have assumed to exercise a power which the Constitution forbids even to Congress and to the States. The Constitution says that—

No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another.

But the railway managements do so discriminate in their regulations relative to river, lake, and ocean ports that shippers have no choice in this regard. Vast quantities of the products of the West would seek the port of New Orleans by the water line of the Mississippi River but for the fact that they are shut off therefrom by the system of freight rates which the railway companies apply to interstate commerce. Like discriminations apply to the ports and commerce of all the States, and our people because of these discriminating rates are shut out from and deprived of the use of the national water ways of the country. Neither Congress nor the States can do this thing which is done by one of the chief instrumentalities of commerce. The power to discriminate is prohibited by the Constitution to Congress and to the States in order to maintain the equality of the States and to promote the interests of commerce. But the chief commercial agent steps in and exercises the power in spite of the Constitution, the Congress, and the States, and this is one of the things which must be put out of the way before good-will and harmonious relations can be established between the railway corporations and the people who supply the traffic which makes up the interstate commerce of the country.

Another feature in the railway management which is a sore vexation to localities and sections throughout the country is found in its assumption of the power to determine where business may be done. The exercise of this power extends to the making and unmaking of cities and towns, the enrichment or impoverishment of sections of country, and interferes with the freedom of selection in the movements of business and the uses of capital. If this pernicious practice were carried on to a like extent by the Government we would have frequent armed insurrections all over this land. Let the Government attempt to determine when and where capital may be employed in any proper industry, and when and where it may not be, it would first encounter the inhibitions of the Constitution, and if it could in any way overcome these and persist in such a practice, then a revolt of the people would put an end to the usurpation. But this is a common practice in railway management. Nothing is more common than for that management to determine that a particular kind of business shall not be allowed to establish itself and thrive in a given town, city, or other locality; that some may become manufacturing centers and that others shall not; that wholesaling may plant itself in some and be excluded from others; that mining may flourish in some places and be repressed in others. And so this potential commercial agency assumes a mastership over every interest and section wholly foreign to the purposes of its creation, and at war with every principle of sound public policy. That the repressive hand of public law should be placed on such practices does not seem to admit of a doubt; and until it is done, rightfully and effectively done, that condition of harmony and good feeling between the railways and the people so essential to the best interests of both can not exist.

Another practice common to railway management remains to be noticed, and it is one of the most unjust and irritating in the list. It is that of the discriminations applied to individuals engaged in like business in the same town or locality. Interferences of this kind in the private affairs of the people are simply monstrous, and while they continue the good feeling and right relations can not be established and maintained between the people and the corporations so much to be desired as an aid in promoting the general welfare, and especially in the regard to which I have directed attention in connection with the securities of such corporations. And it is no wonder that the pools, combinations, and agreements formed and entered into for the protection of railway companies by men who practice these wrongs on others are punctured, collapsed, or exploded almost as fast as created by the action of the element of bad faith among themselves. Men must practice justice in order to command its presence as an agent in the promotion of their own affairs. It is a grand power that directs the operations of the law of retribution, and in the end we find that it is no respecter of persons. The great corporation which disturbs and distresses the business of the private citizen will get no sympathy from the general public when calamity comes to it.

The feeling and principle here involved we find developed from time to time in the spasmodic efforts of the people to obtain and enforce laws containing many just and some unjust provisions; in the harsh verdicts which so often come from juries in railroad cases; and in many other ways in which the resentment of the people is from time to time manifested. It is useless to say that these things ought not to be. They will be as long as the cause which induces them remains. Neither ought to be; and it is the true office of wise public action through the instrumentalities of Government to see to it that an end be put to both, and when this office shall be entered upon in earnest, conservative good-faith it will readily be discovered that the task is not so difficult as we have been accustomed to believe. Let the spirit which guides the movement be of such character and purpose as will be content with the employment of fair, usual, and just methods for reaching the right results desired, and we will be astonished by the comparative ease with which the work can be done. If we only will be as diligent and careful in our efforts to reform the recognized abuses to which I have directed attention as all have been unmindful of their inception and careless of their development, we can soon establish conditions concerning which there will be but little ground on which to plant complaint.

Mr. President, the true interests of this nation lie in a general distribution of business and employment throughout the country. Wherever local conditions are favorable to the establishment of any business, of whatever department of industry it may be, there it should be free to plant itself without let or hinderance from those who manage the transportation of the country. A policy which diversifies employment of capital and labor in every State is the best for all, and consequently most promotive of the public safety and the general welfare. It is not best to force all of our manufacturing industries to a comparatively few centers. A few years ago the youth of our country could find abundant employment in all of the towns and villages of the land. Mechanical trades flourished in them all. Each trade produced all of the articles to it belonging. The industrial education, now so universally discussed and demanded, was then to be had in the mechanic shops of all of our centers of population, from country village to great city. The industrial school was in every city, town, village, and in all of the shops of each throughout all of this land, and these shops were all filled with our youth, whose clever hands learned the use of tools which brought the daily bread and laid the foundations of thrift, success, and fortune.

But the methods of that time have passed away. The mechanic shop of that recent past, in which was manufactured by the hands of the apprentices and journeymen therein employed all of the articles in its line of trade, no longer exists. Machinery now does nearly all of the work which the hands of youth and men were wont to do. The proprietors of the shops of the town and country village now buy in the cities the articles which they sell to their customers; and although such shops still represent the trades which once gave constant local employment to journeymen and apprentices within their walls, they are now mere places of sale and repairing, and no longer of employment and manufacture. And so our youth can not learn the trades, nor even how to manipulate the machine which has supplanted the hands, except as they go from home, its good influences and wholesome restraints, to places more or less distant where our present system of railway management is pleased to allow manufacturing establishments to thrive. A system of centralization, enforced by the coercive power of the present methods of those who administer the transportation of the country, is surely tending to the establishment of social, moral, political, economic, and business conditions which can not be promotive of the public good.

I do not charge that those who are charged with the great and responsible, forceful, and delicate duties which pertain to the transportation system work with a purpose to produce harmful results to the country, its population or its business. I am willing to concede that they are working to a plan which to them seems most conducive to the general welfare. But we all know how a theory, no matter how erroneous it may be, when once it gets possession of the minds of men is almost sure to dominate their better judgment; and how they will resist the force of facts in order to hold on to their theoretical ways. This applies to all men, and to all human activities. It is the one thing, more than all others, which forces true progress to make haste slowly. But in spite of it junctures do arrive when the better and general judgment of communities breaks through the restraint, pushes aside the mistaken theories, recognizes the true nature of the facts involved, and establishes the conditions with which they harmonize. These junctures are the milestones that mark results and distances along the way over which true progress carries a people and advances a country.

We have reached one of those junctures in the affairs of this country, and the general judgment is that the theories on which our transportation system is administered are unsound and obstructive of the general welfare. And in no respect is this more apparent than in the tendency to enforce the centralization to which I have directed attention. Our people have come to realize that a policy which will tend to distribute industries and diversify employment, carrying the former into all localities as in former times, and placing the latter within the reach of the youth of the country as was once the case, is the best for all concerned. The establishment of a policy which will assure to our people a just equality in the matter of transportation will accomplish this now almost universally recognized need. And this will apply no harsh rule to the corporations engaged in the business of transportation. It will not tend to diminish the volume of the traffic they now enjoy, nor will it deprive them of a just compensation for the service to be rendered. It will reintroduce into the business of the country in all of its departments the wholesome influence of a fair competition, now almost wholly excluded by the methods of a coerced centralization and defensive combination. It will tend to distribute throughout the country efforts, measures, and methods which lead to accumulations of wealth and induce the legitimate use of capital in localities where it belongs, and in which it will find remunerative investment. And most assuredly it will be an important agency in the production of that harmony between the people and the corporations so much to be desired for the promotion of the true interests of both.

Mr. President, I shall not pursue in detail the several propositions embraced in the pending resolution. But I may safely venture the statement that not one of them can be omitted from such law as Congress may enact without seriously impairing its efficiency. Nor is there one of them which, if put into practice by the railway corporations themselves in such manner as to be equally applied to all of them, would not tend to promote their best interests. Nor is there one of them that proposes to enlarge the present lawful rights of any city, town, locality, firm, association, individual, or corporation. The trouble is not that the rights do not exist, but that they are not respected in the action and administrative methods of those who manage the transportation system of the country. I could fill many pages of the RECORD with definite facts in support of this statement; but this is rendered unnecessary by the universal knowledge which holds them in possession. Almost every community in the country could supply its quota of such facts. Inequality of treatment, unfair discriminations, harassing interferences relative to the affairs and business of communities and individuals exist everywhere, exciting complaint and inducing exasperation. Nor can these facts be brushed out of the way by general denials and oft-repeated declarations of the steady decline in the average rates for transportation. The denials are not true and the reduced average rates is a mere deception when applied to the specific causes of complaint presented. There has been a marked reduction in the average rate per ton per mile by the railways of the country. There has been a constant improvement in many of their methods.

But neither of these features of the case have any application to the practices which the resolution under consideration declares should be subjected to regulations by law. A diminished average rate is not a sufficient answer to the complaints growing out of discriminating, unstable, capricious rates to which communities and individuals are subjected. It is poor recompense to the city, town, village, firm, association, or individual whose business is repressed by discriminations to be told that the average rate per ton per mile for transportation is much less than it was ten years or five years ago. What the complaining parties want, and what of right they are entitled to, is an equitable sharing in the methods which induce the reduction of the average rate. If the railway companies had so administered their business of transportation as to apply the fact of reduction to all in just proportion, which would have involved the abolition of discriminations and the repression of the industries and business of communities, individuals, and other patrons, we would now be dealing with a case very different from the one before us. It is because they have not done this that Congress is asked to enact regulations for its enforcement. This is the answer to the specious and ever-obtruded plea that a steady reduction of the average rate for transportation is going on. The railway companies have no right to practice the inequalities complained of and then ask to have them justified by showing a reduction in the average charge for service. Let them come with a showing of that fair treatment of their patrons which equality enforces, and they may then, with good reason, ask Congress to withhold an exercise of its power to regulate commerce among the several States.

Mr. President, it seems to me that there is no more important subject invoking the attention and action of Congress than the one presented by this resolution and the bills to which I have alluded, nor is there one more entitled to prompt, conservative, and comprehensive action. I would be glad if there were no necessity for action in this behalf. I am not inclined to impose legislative enactments upon the business affairs of the people and country unless good and sufficient cause demands it. When business is pursuing its own legitimate channels, guided by its own laws and in obedience thereto, I am disposed to let it alone. Its own proper laws are best adapted to its effective and successful movements. When it departs from these and thereby brings harm to the general welfare, the true office of legislation is to restore it to the domination of its own laws from which it has departed. To this extent we may safely go, and to this degree the demands of a very high duty, it seems to me, require us to proceed in the matter of our commerce among the several States. At all events, it seems to me, we should make a start in the direction indicated. This done, even though imperfectly, we will have prepared the way for time and experience to carry us on to wise and thorough work.

I now move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate resumes, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals. The pending question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Florida pardon the Chair for asking him to suspend for a moment to allow the disposition of a bill from the House of Representatives?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives non-concurring in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

Mr. PLUMB. It will be observed that the House has non-concurred in all the amendments of the Senate. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the President pro tempore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. PLUMB, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK the conferees on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 264) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district after the addition of said counties into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and place for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Florida to give way for a few moments that I may ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the special deficiency bill, which has just come from the House, and that the Senate may receive the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the Senator from Iowa the conference report?

Mr. ALLISON. I have just sent it to the clerk's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the conference will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 7, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$15,000."

And the Senate agreed to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said Senate amendment insert the following: "That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to settle and allow, if found correct, the accounts of the disbursing clerks of the Interior Department for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884, for disbursements made on account of support of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum by transfer of any unexpended balance, and apply the same to purposes for which the subdivisions of the appropriations for said institution for the years above mentioned are exhausted. And the payments made to clerks, watchmen, laborers, laundresses, and teamsters of said hospital for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884 may be allowed and chargeable to the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses for said fiscal years respectively; but the aggregate amounts appropriated for the expenses of the hospital and asylum for the above fiscal years shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized. The amount of said transfers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, shall not exceed $1,000."

And the Senate agreed to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment and add at the end thereof the following: "Except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property."

And the Senate agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
JAS. B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
SAM. J. RANDALL,
JAMES N. BURNES,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now report the resolution of the House of Representatives on the conference report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 25, 1884.

Resolved, That the House concur in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

The bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. If the Senator from Florida will yield I should like to have the bill put on its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I do not know; it is getting very late in the evening, and I shall have to decline to speak altogether if I am interrupted any further.

Mr. MANDERSON. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator if he does not wish to yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance. The Chair will state to the Senator from Florida that all that has been done was done under the rules, which the Chair felt it its duty to do.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I understand that, Mr. President.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desired to call attention to the bill just received from the other House to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr. During Wednesday's session the Senate passed a similar bill, and I ask unanimous consent that that bill may now be placed on its passage. It seems to me a matter of importance to the parties concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the House bill just laid before the Senate be now considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The bill before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not advised whether the last section was contained in the Senate bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. No, sir; it was not. I was not aware that that section had been added to the bill. The bill, as it passed the Senate, merely changed the name of the Marsh National Bank; it had no reference to the Nashville bank. I presume, therefore, it will have to be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. MCPHERSON to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, I do not intend to pursue the line of argument that has been followed up by those who have preceded me in the discussion of this bill. I take it that every Senator will concede that before a measure of this kind is enacted into the form of a law we ought to be able to satisfy our minds that there exists authority in the Constitution for it.

Of course we all know that there has been a good deal of loose legislation of late years passed through both Houses of Congress, but after a full review of this bill, testing it in every possible way by the standard of the organic law, I am free to say that it is the most extraordinary measure I have ever known introduced in the Senate.

Notwithstanding all that has been said against the constitution of the Senate, I am inclined to think after all that it is the best security and safeguard for the interests of the States and the people. Of course the rules of this body will not permit me to refer to the House of Representatives, although if I were to follow the example set me by some Senators here in the discussion on the naval bill I would be at full liberty to refer to it; but I have confidence in the Senate, and when I find a bill like this coming here from the popular branch of the Government I am inclined to think that the framers of the Constitution were not at fault when they created a body in which the States are especially and particularly represented without regard to population or anything else.

This body, I say, was created by the framers of the Constitution as the especial guardians of the rights of the States. Each State has here equality of power, and I do not remember an instance within my time of service here when it has not been ready to vindicate the great principle on which its organization is based. It has often been called the house of lords; popular clamor has been raised against it; but, notwithstanding all that, when it comes to the consideration soberly of those great questions which affect the interests of the political communities that we are here representing, I think it will be found that this at last has been the safeguard of the rights of the people and the States.

I have never known a bill that infringed those rights more than this does. In my opinion it violates nearly every principle of the Constitution. I asked the Senator from Kansas the other day under what clause of our fundamental law could be found authority to pass this bill. Well, he said, he was not prepared to discuss the constitutional question. I do not say that I am, and those who know me in this body know that I have never been a stickler for an illiberal construction of our fundamental law, that I have always been disposed to go as far as any rational man could go in giving it a liberal and fair interpretation in the interest of the people and the States.

If I wanted to select a text for my argument or speech on this bill I would take the tenth amendment, and it is a part of the Constitution which we have all sworn to support:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Now, sir, where can be found power to enact this bill? If it can not be found in the authority to regulate commerce I say it can not be found at all, and there is where the advocates of it place it.

What does the first section of this bill propose? The Commissioner of Agriculture is to organize a bureau of animal industry and appoint a surgeon to report in respect to the domestic animals of the United States, their protection, use, and diseases, &c. He is authorized to employ a number of persons, not exceeding twenty, to aid in carrying out the act. If I were disposed to quarrel with the verbal structure of this bill and had anything of the qualities of a humorist, I could push it to the extreme of absolute ridicule. What would not fall under the phrase "domestic animals," as employed in this first section? It would embrace horses, cows, chickens, poultry of every description, hogs, sheep, and everything in that line. "Animal" is defined to be "any living sensitive creature having the power of locomotion but inferior to man." Somebody's imagination that is broader than mine can take in how much that embraces. The poet Young says:

> Were they as vain as gaudy-minded man,
> Their arts and conquests animals might boast,
> And claim this laurel crown as well as we.

This commission is authorized to take into consideration the state and condition of all domestic animals—dogs, horses, pigs, every description of animals. The hen-roosts of the States are to be invaded by Federal officials. Into the lady's parlor, where her lap-dog is found, is to be intruded the arm of the Federal Government under the provisions of this bill; that is, if the officers who are designated to give effect to it will carry out its literal meaning. They need not resort to construction, because the plainest interpretation will tell you that "domestic animals" embrace every description of creatures that I have enumerated. They are not required to go any further with respect to those animals than to inquire into their condition and report upon it, and they are to get a per diem for this service, and the report is to come here from the Agricultural Department. Ah, Mr. President, this is getting far away from the landmarks of the Constitution.

I wish to know if when this fundamental law of ours was brought into existence, due to the necessity to regulate commerce with foreign nations and between the States, it was contemplated by its framers that jurisdiction over cows and horses and dogs and swine was a necessity that gave rise to its formation. Chief-Justice Marshall has told us in his great opinion in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden that it was the necessity for a power to regulate commerce which gave us this grand organic law. But was it this kind of commerce? No, sir; it was commerce as understood in an enlightened and liberal sense, that related to traffic between nations and between States in a comprehensive sense, and not the exercise of a mere municipal police power to go down into the households and to the farm-seats of the people of America and undertake to control their domestic and private affairs.

I say we have gone at times a good way from the landmarks of this sacred instrument——

Mr. PLUMB. How about the school bill?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will discuss the school bill with you at the proper time. I have given my reasons for my vote on that already. This is not the school bill, let me tell the Senator from Kansas. That related to men; this to brutes.

The second section of this bill empowers, or authorizes, at least, the appointment of two United States stock-raisers, who are to report upon the best method of transporting and caring for animals—that is, all kinds of animals, not cattle—to provide for the extirpation of pleuropneumonia and the spread of other contagious and infectious diseases among every description of animals, dogs, cats, swine, sheep, hogs, cows, horses—everything that comes under the head of animal this bill authorizes. It may be said that the poverty of human language is so great that the average legislator can not describe a cow any better than by employing the word "animal." I tell those interested in this bill that the word "animal" goes far beyond a cow, and would be so held by any tribunal and would be held so by the officers empowered to carry out the provisions of this act.

Then the third section authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to prepare such rules and regulations as he thinks proper for the "suppression and extirpation of said diseases," that is, diseases affecting all kinds of animals, for the word "animal" is carried all through this bill. I should like to know where Congress gets authority to delegate this power to the Commissioner of Agriculture. This bill has been reformed since first introduced, to make it more acceptable to the Senate; but under this power to make rules here given to the Commissioner everything that was in it before can be introduced. This body has no authority to delegate its legislative power to any commissioner. Where rules are authorized to be made by the courts authority is given in the fundamental law, but authority is not proper to be given in cases of this kind to a commissioner; they may have the effect of statutes upon the rights and the interests of the people and communities where they are made to operate.

He is to invite the State authorities to co-operate in the enforcement of this act, and whenever the plans of the Commissioner for the suppression of disease are accepted by a State or the plans of the State are accepted by the Commissioner the latter is empowered to spend the money that is to be appropriated by this bill. Then if he makes rules authorizing the use of slaughter-pens in every locality in the country the $500,000 appropriated by this bill may be used and employed to compensate the cow-owners whose herds are killed in the Federal slaughter-houses.

But it does not confine itself to cows. It still keeps up the word "animal," for I think when this bill was framed those who drew it expected it to have a much more extensive operation than some imagine; and under this provision of it they could set up a corps of dog-killers in every town and village in the country and slaughter the dogs in midsummer when their presence might be dangerous to the inhabitants, and their owners claim compensation for them under the provisions of this bill. A dog is an animal and a domestic animal, and comes within the literal meaning of the bill.

So then here we have authority to organize an establishment under the authority of the United States to slaughter domestic animals of every description, and to pay their owners for them, if disease should be apprehended or contagion be suspected. And this is all under the power to regulate commerce between the States as contemplated by the framers of the Constitution!

Now mark, Mr. President, as I go on, the objectionable features of this bill as a regulation of commerce. The Commissioner is authorized to invite the State authorities to co-operate in the enforcement of this act, and when they come to a common agreement about it then they can get the money. I ask any Senator who has read the provisions of our Constitution with respect to the subject of commerce and the decisions of our highest court upon that question, where can be authority for this concurrent power?

The leading case on that subject, as every lawyer knows, is the great case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in which the talent of Oakley and of Emmet, men among the first counsel that America had at that day, endeavored to impress upon the mind of the Supreme Court that the commercial power of Congress under the Constitution was a concurrent power and could be exercised by the States concurrently with the General Government. That was a test case, and I say here that the principle of it has never been departed from in any decision now upon the records of our courts.

The commercial power given by the Constitution is an exclusive power, and the States have nothing to do with it. They can not go into any copartnership with this Government with respect to the cattle business or anything else. It never was intended that two sovereignties should blend themselves together in matters of this kind to carry out any public policy relating to the people of the States. After the great arguments that were made in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, Chief-Justice Marshall summed them up on this point in a few words. He said:

> It has been contended by the counsel for the appellant that as the word "to regulate" implies in its nature full power over the thing to be regulated, it excludes necessarily the action of all others that would perform the same operation on the same thing. That regulation is designed for the entire result, applying to those parts which remain as they were as well as to those which are altered. It produces a uniform whole, which is as much disturbed and deranged by changing what the regulating power designs to leave untouched as that on which it has operated.

Mr. Webster, who was the leading counsel in this case, contended for that principle, and his argument prevailed:

> He contended, therefore, that the people intended in establishing the Constitution to transfer from the several States to a General Government those high and important powers over commerce which in their exercise were to maintain an uniform and general system. From the very nature of the case these powers must be exclusive.

No lawyer of recent days has denied the correctness of that legal proposition; and still this bill under this supposed power to regulate commerce authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture to enter into a kind of partnership with the State authorities and to get their consent to this act, or for them to adopt some rules themselves, and then for him to consent. Is that a sound constitutional principle? This Government is independent of the governments of the States, and the governments of the States with respect to every power and authority reserved in the tenth amendment are independent of the Government of the United States. It was intended that this condition of things should exist.

Then what does this bill further provide? It provides that whenever the Commissioner of Agriculture declares that there exists in any State contagious disease, and the State fails to provide for its extinction and co-operate with the Commissioner, the President is authorized to put a stop to the transportation of cattle from such State. What does this do? It gives the Commissioner of Agriculture authority to put a veto upon the decision of a sovereign State of this Union. If the State decides that there is no necessity for the intervention of this sanitary power and the Commissioner disagrees with it, the decision of the Commissioner is to prevail, and upon his certifying the facts to the President, the President can destroy by a scratch of his pen the commerce of that State, as far as catttle are concerned, with the whole world. That is the bill.

The ultimate decision is left with this little man—not little in the sense that some might regard him, but little officially when compared with the authorities of a State in reference to a matter relating to its own domestic policy and interest—and the Commissioner of Agriculture is to come up and say, "My opinion is contrary to yours, and I insist that this national quarantine shall be put in operation against your State, and you can not help it." The President's proclamation then goes out, and that State is cut off from the privilege of commercial intercourse with the whole world as far as her trade in cattle or animals of any description is concerned.

Sir, if this is not the exercise of the police power of a State, what is it? It is not the exercise of the commercial power, for that can be demonstrated. It is an attempt to exercise what every jurist from the foundation of this Government has asserted to be a power that belongs to the States, the inspection power expressly reserved to the States, acknowledged by Chief-Justice Marshall in his decision in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden.

It is well understood by those who have investigated this subject that there is a class of laws known as inspection laws. They are laws which prepare articles for export and give a guarantee to the public of the country and of the world that they are in a condition for exportation, for sale, and for consumption as food. If ever there was a law that could be considered an inspection law, this is that law, and it is well known to those who have considered the subject that commercial regulations under our system have never touched articles of commerce until after the inspection laws of the States had been executed.

After the States have exercised their power under the inspection laws and prepared the articles subject to them for transportation, then the commercial power of the Union comes in and can regulate them as articles of export, but not before; and nobody has ever claimed that under the power to regulate commerce in this Government the power to carry on a system of inspection with reference to goods of any description could be claimed. The Constitution itself expressly recognizes the authority of the States to adopt and carry out an inspection system. Clause 2 of section 10 of article 1 reads:

> No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws.

What are "inspection laws?" Here you have the express authority of the fundamental law for the position that the inspection laws of the States were never to be interfered with by the General Government, and that in derogation to the principle giving to the United States authority to levy a tax on imports for general expenses, falling within the enumerated powers, the States under the Constitution could be permitted to levy a tax upon exports to meet the charges attending inspection of commodities to be sent abroad from the respective States for sale. So where are you going to confine this?

Do you pretend to say that cattle are not merchandise, that horses, that hogs, that everything which the productive energies of man bring into existence do not fall under the jurisdiction of inspection laws? The purpose and object of all inspection laws is to see that the articles sent to foreign countries or to other States are such as will warrant their exportation as healthy products; and this bill proposes to take this power away from the States where it was left expressly by the Constitution and give it to the General Government. Let me read a little as to what is meant by "inspection laws:"

> The inspection laws are very important regulations of trade. Tucker says: "There seems to be one class of laws which respects foreign commerce, over which the States still retain an absolute authority; those, I mean, which relate to the inspection of their own produce, for the execution of which they may even lay an impost or duty, as far as may be absolutely necessary for that purpose. Of this necessity it seems presumable they are to be regarded as the sole judges."

That is a quotation from Tucker's Blackstone, and this is added to the argument by the very eminent counsel in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and worthy of reflection because his views received the sanction of the court. On this question Mr. Emmet said:

> The extent and importance of this system of regulations does not strike the mind at the first view; nor do the powerful inferences it affords to show the concurrent right in the States to regulate commerce. Judge Tucker has very imperfectly stated their extent. They do indeed regulate in almost every State the foreign trade so far as it is connected with our produce to be exported; but they do not confine themselves to produce to be exported; they relate to imports also. They act by restraining, and sometimes prohibiting, the exportation and importation of certain articles.
> Before examining those laws it may be asked from whence is the right of restraining derived but from the more extended right of prohibiting? The difference between regulation or restraining and interdiction is only a difference of degree in the exercise of the same right, and not a difference of right. The article in the Constitution, article 1, section 10, impliedly allows that right to be in the several States, and the right to enforce their laws by any other means than imposts and duties, and therefore by prohibitions of exports or imports. The right does not depend on the idea that the thing prohibited or restrained from being exported or imported is dangerous or noxious, even if that could ex necessitate create a right and give it to the State instead of the Congressional jurisdiction; on the contrary, the rules and enactments seem arbitrary.

And he cites for instance a law of New York, enacted under this power that I speak of, that prescribed the number of hoops and the size of the barrels and casks in which articles of export had to go out of the country. The Supreme Court in this same case, the opinion being delivered by Chief-Justice Marshall, adopted the views of the distinguished counsel, so far as the inspection laws were concerned, although the court did not concur with him in his illustration of the principles to the extent to which he carried them. Here is what Chief-Justice Marshall says about them:

> That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived can not be admitted. The object of inspection laws is to improve the quality of articles produced by the labor of a country, to fit them for exportation, or, it may be, for domestic use.

Mr. President, if I had been called upon to frame language with especial reference to the object of this bill I could not have used words more strongly than those of the Chief-Justice of the United States expounding the Constitution in regard to our inspection laws:

> They act upon the subject before it becomes an article of foreign commerce or of commerce among the States, and prepare it for that purpose.

Mark that. They act upon the cattle in the field, the goods in the factory. Everything while it is a part of the general mass of property in a State the inspection laws act upon, and the Federal power can not go there.

> They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government—all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State, and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

That is the language of a man who above all others in this country understood the Constitutition, and it can not be charged against him that he ever restricted it to narrow limits because the school of politics that differed from him—if I am permitted to mention politics at all in connection with the name of so illustrious a judicial officer—the school of politics that disagreed with him at the time he lived in contended that he carried the provisions of the Constitution far beyond the bounds intended by its original framers; and still in this very opinion, the leading one upon the subject of the rights of the States under the commercial power, he expressly reserved to the States the authority to inspect every article that they raised within them for export and to put it into a condition to secure profitable returns to the producers.

After those articles are put on shipboard, after they are on railways, it may be, it is possible that the Federal power may be invoked for some sanitary purpose; but so long as they form a part of the great mass of the property of the respective States, there is no authority in this Government to go there and make any laws in regard to them.

This idea is further illustrated by Chief-Justice Marshall in the case of Brown vs. The State of Maryland, in 12 Wheaton, when he is speaking of where the power of the Federal Government begins and where that of the States ends in matters of this kind. Here was a case where the State of Maryland attempted to levy a tax upon imports that had paid duty at the custom-house before bulk was broken and before the goods formed a part of the general property of the State, and it was held that the Maryland law was unconstitutional, because, as Chief-Justice Marshall contended, the importer had a right to the full benefits of the import after having paid his tax to the Federal authority, and he could not be required by the State to pay a license to dispose of those goods in bulk after they had passed the custom-house. But he did not stop there; he went on and said that after the property passed from the custom-house and became a part of the general mass of the merchandise and property of the State, then the unlimited power of State authority and taxation extended to it.

Now, what is the provision of this bill? It is to operate upon a description of property in the fields of the West and of the South before it is in any condition to be shipped anywhere. As I have shown awhile ago, under the authority of this bill the Federal office-holder can go into the fields in Florida and Texas and Alabama and Kansas and set up an arbitrary system of inspection and of health laws in regard to this description of animals, and cats and dogs if he wishes, and set aside all State authority and say: "I require certain things to be done before you can be permitted to transport your goods to a foreign jurisdiction."

Mr. President, before passing from this part of the subject I can not help observing upon the jealousy of the framers of the Constitution in regard to exports, for while it gives authority to levy a tax upon imports it expressly denies authority to Congress to levy a tax upon exports. They were fearful that that power might be derived by implication; and now what was the reason of that provision?

This is an instrument that has been guarded in every line. When the framers of the Constitution denied to this Government authority to levy a tax upon exports it was not without a purpose. It was the design and purpose to leave the genius of commerce the fullest possible scope. We have known of instances where by the exercise of this power to levy taxes on exports the most unfortunate results have followed by the action of foreign countries; but this Constitution says Congress shall not levy a tax upon exports, and still under the power to regulate commerce it is claimed that we may put a barrier against any State under the decision of the Commissioner of Agriculture and impoverish thousands of men whose goods may be as fit for exportation as those of any other people in the Union.

I think we have gone far enough in this direction, and it is time to call a halt. If any of the States have diseased cattle, let them kill them and draw upon the treasury of their own people to pay for them.

Reference has been made to the quarantine law, and I think we have gone a little too far in that direction, much farther than the early fathers of the Constitution contemplated, because you will find, Mr. President, that in 1789 and 1796, all along the period when the Constitution was first adopted, by general consent of the leading minds of this country the subject of quarantine was left with the people of the States, and Congress passed laws requiring the officers of this Government to respect the quarantine laws of the States. Those laws are yet upon the statute-book. They came from men who participated in the framing of the Constitution, and who at least understood it as well as the generation that now lives.

So it was with the pilot laws. In 1789 Congress authorized the adoption of the existing pilot laws of the States, and they have continued from that day to this to regulate this important subject. This was the spirit in which the early fathers understood the Constitution, but we have been going on from one point to another until there is hardly a relation, however private or domestic, that it is thought this Government ought not to reach.

I say, Mr. President, that the best and surest security we have for the continuance of this system of government is to keep its powers within the limitations prescribed in our organic law; that the diversified interests of this continent are too great for any uniform system, and that so long as the powers of this Government are employed in regulating those matters which can be properly made the subject of uniform regulation without producing conflicts of local interest, we shall have the best guarantee for its continuance.

But I say if the time shall unhappily arrive when, departing from the genius of this grand structure, you carry this Federal authority into every domestic concern of every State throughout the land, you will have laid the seed for future trouble and dissension, and perhaps more than that. God forbid! Let us stand by this great organic charter. It is ample for all legitimate purposes. Let us understand the Constitution as its framers understood it. Do not let us give half a million dollars to a lot of inspectors to go down among the herds and swine of the States to pry into the private affairs of the people and interfere with them. Leave those people to their domestic institutions and they will take care of themselves, but do not educate them up to the idea that there is to be a remedy found here for every little inconvenience or necessity that may arise in the course of human affairs within the States.

The Senator from Kansas a while ago alluded to the school matter. I gave my reasons for my support of the school bill, but I say to him and to anybody that thinks with him that there is no authority in that measure for this. I said that in voting a few millions of dollars, after the examples of the past, to the aid of the common-school systems of the States without interfering with their autonomy or their management, I was doing nothing but what had been done for generations before; that I was in the line of preparing and qualifying ignorance to enjoy the benefits of freedom, and giving security to this grand popular system which I hope is destined to live as long as the world shall last. It was not a vote in the direction of impairing the foundations of this grand structure, but it was in the line of strengthening it and improving it, as I think.

But I see the tendencies of measures like this. I see that after you get a cattle bill or a bill relating to one particular branch of industry there will be applications here for a hundred others from a class of people that are as meritorious as those who raise cows.

I have heard it stated here time and again, and very unwisely as I thought, that certain avocations, certain classes of the American people were not obtaining the advantages they were entitled to under this Government. Mr. President, I have never heard that sentiment advanced here except with regret. This is not a government of classes, it is a government of equality, and no class has any special claim upon it for favors. We do not know the laborer, the farm hand, the factory hand, the mechanic, the cow driver. The people who were intended to live under and enjoy the benefits of this Government are the American people without regard to condition, avocation, or rank; and all this legislation looking to favors to particular classes, to the promulgation of the idea that this description of person or that have not got all out of this Government they ought to have, is a thing that never ought to be put forth by any representative man.

Sir, I venture to say that in the early days of the Government if anybody had brought forth a bill like this under the power to regulate commerce, it would not have received a moment's thought in either House of Congress. This only shows the necessity even at this day of keeping within the reasonable limits of the fundamental law. I think that this bill is a clear and open violation of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question before he sits down?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask him how he can justify upon the principles of his argument on this bill his vote upon the bill to aid in the support of our common schools and the yellow-fever bill. I should like him to do that before he sits down.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I have said repeatedly that that is no argument. I say the cases are not analogous. I say that the health laws of no country and no quarantine system as understood ever were intended to refer to cattle. I say that cattle are merchandise; they are brutes; and what I have said about the school question I need not repeat.

I gave my reasons for it, and I thought I found authority in the Constitution for it. That may be a matter of difference between myself and my friend. I said that this Government had brought into existence 5,000,000 citizens and invested them with political power. They were not cattle or horses. They were sentient creatures, invested with great public rights and duties toward this Government; and after this Government had decided to place them in this responsible position, however late it may have come, I thought it was perfectly competent for it to aid in qualifying them for the discharge of the great trusts put upon them. But that is not the case with diseased cattle in this country or anywhere else; and when the framers of this instrument intended to form it in 1789 and to make it a system to operate upon the people instead of States, as it formerly operated, it was not intended that it should operate on cattle.

I say there is ample authority within the States to take care of this subject for themselves, and when you come to analyze this bill it will be found to be a bill that intends to carry out of the Federal Treasury the money necessary to pay for the diseased stock which a little disease may render it necessary to destroy in the respective States. This $500,000 is to be employed to pay for the slaughtered herds that the cattle health of some States may require to be slaughtered. I am not prepared to go quite that far.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me he has not touched the main question.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I should like for the Senator to touch it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state it. The Senator was a very earnest advocate of the yellow-fever bill.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I was not an earnest advocate of it. I may have voted for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. He made an argument and a very able one, according to my recollection, in favor of it; but I may possibly be mistaken.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I think I voted for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How can he justify his vote for the yellow-fever bill with his vote upon this bill? Because he must admit if the Congress of the United States has power to regulate commerce so as to protect the health and lives of our people it has power to regulate it so that it shall not damage them in their property.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. It has been some time since the quarantine bill was before the Senate. I remember that it guarded very particularly the rights of the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have the act right here. It gives full value.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. To which act does the Senator refer?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The yellow-fever act that passed Congress. Here it is. It recognizes the full power of Congress, and authorizes quarantine not only against foreign countries but between the States.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will thank the Senator if he will not interrupt me; he can speak hereafter. I claim that men are not brutes, and while I might be disposed to preserve the public health I recognize the distinction between cattle and men. I say that no quarantine system in the civilized world has ever before been held to embrace cattle. It is not known under the quarantine system. It is a police power relating to brutes, and whenever you use the word "quarantine" you mean to guard the health of individuals against contagion from individuals.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator certainly understands that the quarantining of a ship stops the vessel, its crew, and cargo. All can be stopped by a law of Congress, so that it touches property as well as person.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. The laws of the United States are supreme in matters of commerce; they can stop anything. The authority of the United States Government with respect to commerce is very general and very unlimited; but so far as the power of quarantine is concerned it has not, as I understand, been taken away from the States. It is exercised to-day by all the States in this Union, in New York, Massachusetts; and although there has been a little additional power given there the system itself has remained substantially the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yet here is a law expressly——

Mr. JONES, of Florida. If the Senator will not interrupt me I would rather that he should make his speech upon that point after I get through. That is no reply to the argument that this is not a regulation of commerce but the exercise of the police power of the State. That is the point I am making. If the Senator will refer to it he will find that the State quarantine systems in my State are just as intact as they were before that law was passed; and in New York——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will not deny that there are many powers belonging to the National Government which the States have been allowed to exercise, and which Congress may resume at any time; for instance, the power in regard to wharfage and mileage. He must admit that they are commercial powers if he will not admit that Congress has a right to control commerce so that it may not carry disease to men or disease that may destroy their property, either from abroad or from State to State. There can be no escape from the logic of that argument.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. We might differ about that, but I say the power to regulate commerce is an exclusive power in this Government and can not be delegated to anybody; and that, as has been stated here, it is not a police power. The quarantine power is not a commercial power strictly speaking. Judge Marshall said it was not. I do not follow him implicitly in everything, but he is great authority.

I say that this is the first attempt, so far as I know, to establish a quarantine system with respect to cattle.

I admitted very frankly in the outset of the argument that we have gone a great way; but that only shows the danger we are in of going too far. As I said in a former debate here, I attach no consequence and I never refer to previous votes in the Senate for any purpose. That amounts to nothing. I claim the right of changing my opinion at any time. But I say that the two questions are not analogous, and that there is a great distinction between the system to which the Senator refers, looking to the preservation of the health of men, women, and children, and a system which authorizes the Federal Government to go into a State and slaughter the cattle of the people and set off a boundary against the exportation, which is merchandise, and its property, and thus possibly bring ruin to thousands of men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator does not seem disposed to understand me. I want to ask again the question, do you deny that Congress has the power to prohibit the introduction of diseased animals from abroad?

Mr. JONES, of Florida. That is not this question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, it is.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If Congress can prohibit their introduction from foreign countries under the commercial power, can not Congress under that same power prohibit the traffic in diseased cattle between the States? In my judgment Congress has exactly the same absolute power over the commerce in both cases, whether it is international or interstate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. INGALLS in the chair). The question is on the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. COKE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senator from Texas to withhold his motion for a moment, until I can make a statement.

Mr. COKE. I will withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. PLUMB. I shall hope that on Monday the consideration of this bill may be concluded, and that we may have a vote upon it. While I do not ask for any understanding upon that point, I simply give notice that I shall ask the Senate to come to a final conclusion upon the bill at Monday's session.

Mr. COKE. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 25, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed joint resolutions and bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall;

Joint resolution (S. R. 81) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution;

A bill (S. 1545) to amend section 2148 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to trespassers on Indian lands; and

A bill (S. 1581) to provide for the disposal of abandoned and useless military reservations.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. BREWER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6769) to establish a port of delivery at Salamanca, N. Y.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. HUNT. I ask unanimous consent to submit for immediate consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, May 24, after the reading of the Journal, be assigned for the consideration of bill of the House No. 4987, for the encouragement of the American merchant marine, and to promote postal and commercial relations between foreign countries, not to interfere with revenue and appropriation bills and reports, and consideration of bills from the Committee on Public Lands and prior orders of the House, provided said bill is not sooner reached under the terms of the special order of February 29.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. If the exception of prior orders includes the bill for a building for the Congressional Library, I must object.

The SPEAKER. The bill excepts all prior orders. Objection is made.

KICKAPOO RESERVATION IN KANSAS.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3201) to provide for the sale of the Kickapoo diminished reservation in Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill. Before he concluded,

Mr. MORRISON said: I must object.

BRIDGE AT NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. CALDWELL. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 304) to give the assent of Congress to the construction of a free bridge by the mayor and city council of Nashville, Tenn., over the Cumberland River.

Mr. BEACH. I object.

ALABAMA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3931) to create an additional United States judicial district, and to establish circuit and district courts therein, in the State of Alabama, with amendments by the Senate, that I may move concurrence in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendments will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert as follows:

"That the counties of Sumter, Greene, Hale, and Pickens, included in the southern district of Alabama, and the counties of Tuscaloosa, Bibb, Shelby, and Talladega, included in the middle district of Alabama, shall be hereafter included in and constitute part of the northern district of said State.

"SEC. 2. That the said northern district is hereby divided into two divisions, which shall be known as the northern and southern divisions of the northern district of Alabama. The southern division of said northern district shall include the counties of Sumter, Greene, Hale, Pickens, Tuscaloosa, Lamar, Fayette, Walker, Jefferson, Blount, Bibb, Shelby, Saint Clair, Etowah, Calhoun, Cleburne, Clay, Talladega, Cherokee, and De Kalb; and a term of the district court and circuit court of the United States for said northern district shall be held for said southern division at the city of Birmingham, in said county of Jefferson, twice in each year, on the first Mondays in March and September. The remaining counties in said northern district shall constitute the northern division thereof; and the terms of the district and circuit courts of the United States for said northern division shall be held therein at the times and place now prescribed by law.

"SEC. 3. That all offenses hereafter committed in either of said divisions shall be cognizable and indictable within the division where committed; and all grand and petit jurors summoned for service in each division shall be inhabitants thereof; and all offenses committed within either of said districts prior to the time this act goes into operation shall be prosecuted and tried as if this act had not been passed.

"SEC. 4. That all civil suits not of a local character which shall be hereafter brought in the circuit or district court of the United States for the northern district of Alabama, in either of said divisions, against a single defendant, or where all the defendants reside in the same division of said district, shall be brought in the division in which the defendant or defendants reside; but if there are two or more defendants, residing in different divisions, such suit may be brought in either division; and all mesne and final process, subject to the provisions of this act, issued in either of said divisions, may be served and executed in either or both of the divisions.

"SEC. 5. That all civil suits and proceedings now pending in the circuit or district courts in said State shall not be affected by this act.

"SEC. 6. That this act shall be in force from the 1st day of January, 1885; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

Amend the title so as to read:

"An act to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district after the addition of said counties into two divisions and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate amendments?

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will have to demand the regular order. The last three or four calls for consent have resulted in nothing.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. MCMILLIN. As there was a call yesterday of committees, I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that motion he will submit some personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GRAVES, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DORSHEIMER, until Tuesday, April 29.

To Mr. GOFF, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HEMPHILL, for ten days, from to-morrow, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. BUDD, until Tuesday.

CORRECTION OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have a correction made. On the 7th March the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported a bill to amend section 2743 of the Revised Statutes. By an oversight the bill was sent to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. It is a public bill, and the Chair thinks the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar should be discharged from its further consideration and that it should be placed on the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, as of that day. If there be no objection that will be done.

There was no objection.

VOTE ON NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER. On yesterday the Chair announced the result of the vote on concurring in the forty-first amendment proposed by the Senate to the naval appropriation bill as 136 in the affirmative and 106 in the negative. The Chair was under the impression at the time there was some mistake about the affirmative vote, but on a hasty re-examination of the roll-call the mistake was not discovered. The true vote was 127 in the affirmative and 106 in the negative. The mistake occurred in summing up the votes cast on the second call of the roll.

ALABAMA JUDICIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. I withdraw the objection to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill called up by the gentleman from Alabama.

The SPEAKER. But the regular order has been demanded by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN].

Mr. MCMILLIN. As the amendments have been read and may probably be concurred in without objection, I withdraw the call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 3931)?

There was no objection.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARSH NATIONAL BANK OF LINCOLN, NEBR., ETC.

Mr. WEAVER. I ask consent to take from the House Calendar for consideration at this time House bill 5966, to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., a corporation transacting business in Lincoln, Lancaster County, and State of Nebraska, shall be changed to the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, whenever the board of directors of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln shall accept the new name by resolution of the said board, and cause a copy of said resolution, duly authenticated, to be filed with the Comptroller of the Currency: Provided, That such acceptance be made within six months after the passage of this act, and that all the expenses incident to such change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by said bank.

SEC. 2. That the debts, dividends, liabilities, rights, privileges, and powers of said Marsh National Bank of Lincoln shall devolve upon and inure to the said Capital National Bank of Lincoln whenever such change of name is effected.

SEC. 3. That nothing in this act contained shall so be construed as in any manner to release the Marsh National Bank from any liability, or affect any action or proceeding in law in which said bank may be or become a party or interested.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been read? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CALDWELL. I move to amend the bill by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the First National Bank of Nashville, located in the city of Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, is hereby authorized to increase its capital stock in accordance with existing law to any sum not exceeding $1,000,000, notwithstanding the limits heretofore fixed in its original articles of association and determined by the Comptroller of the Currency; and the Comptroller of the Currency is hereby authorized to fix the limit of increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., at $1,000,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. BEACH. I do not object to the consideration of these bills, although I think it possible that I ought to do so. A few days ago I introduced a bill authorizing the Comptroller of the Currency to change the names of national banks. There is no reason why we should have this special legislation in each case. I think that a general bill might be passed in the time that would be consumed in passing any one of these special bills.

Mr. WEAVER. The gentleman does not object to this bill?

Mr. BEACH. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not now object. The Chair asked for objection and none was made, and the bill is before the House for consideration. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BUCKNER. The title of the bill should be amended so as to indicate the purpose of the amendment to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The title will be amended to conform to the amendment made to the bill.

Mr. WEAVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature, this being Friday.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

The SPEAKER. That requires a two-third vote.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 94, noes 16.

Mr. DEUSTER. No quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. MCMILLIN and Mr. DEUSTER were appointed.

Mr. MCMILLIN (one of the tellers). Nothing but private bills can be reported to-day, and I supposed there would be no objection to dispensing with the morning hour for that purpose.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 144, noes 19.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the morning hour was dispensed with.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

Mr. DIBRELL. Pending that motion I move that all general debate on private bills to be considered to-day be limited to thirty minutes on each bill.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done except as to the bill under consideration.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The gentleman can make that motion in regard to the pending bill.

Mr. DIBRELL. I will do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the motion so as to allow debate for an hour on the pending bill. That is one of the most important of all the bills on the Private Calendar. It involves a principle which has arrested in an unusual degree the attention of this House—that of recognizing the old Spanish-Mexican grants with their indefinite limits; and where by any accident the Government has disposed of the lands claimed under this grant, to allow patents to be issued to be located elsewhere, which have come to be worth and are worth now all the way from $5 up to $20 an acre.

The SPEAKER. The motion to limit debate is not debatable.

Mr. DIBRELL. I desire to state that my object in making the motion was to limit debate on each bill. I think that thirty minutes is enough time to expend in debate to explain why any bill should or should not pass. We have heretofore discussed one private bill for three days, and the one now under consideration in the Committee of the Whole will be discussed for three days unless some limit is placed upon debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] moves to limit debate on the pending bill in Committee of the Whole to thirty minutes, fifteen minutes to be allowed on each side. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr HOLMAN] moves to amend so as to allow one hour for debate.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And I move to amend the amendment so as to allow two hours for debate. This is an important debate.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 17, noes 75.

So (no further count being called for) the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to limit debate to one hour.

Mr. DIBRELL. I will accept that amendment and modify my motion accordingly.

The SPEAKER. The amendment having been accepted, the question then is upon the motion to limit debate upon the bill now under consideration in Committee of the Whole House to one hour.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering business on the Private Calendar.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The unfinished business coming over from Friday last was the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House the general debate upon this bill has been limited to one hour.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is it in order to ask that the bill be now read? A number of gentlemen now here have never heard it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the bill will be read.

There being no objection, the bill (as published in the proceedings of last Friday) was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I feel quite confident——

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know something about the division of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is recognized. The Chair understands that he made the motion in the House allowing one hour for debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am recognized, and under the rules of course that gives me an hour, I believe.

Mr. COSGROVE. Then the other side is to have no time at all! Is that the gentleman's idea?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is the rule of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am sorry the rules are so arbitrary. [Laughter.]

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman from Tennessee——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will make some arrangement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt that will be done.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to have an understanding now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only recognize a gentleman for one hour under the rules.

Mr. COSGROVE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DIBRELL] made a motion in the House that debate on this bill be limited to thirty minutes, to be divided, fifteen minutes on each side. As an amendment to that motion the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] moved to substitute one hour. The gentleman from Tennessee accepted that amendment, which implied, as a matter of course, that there should be a division of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE], who is in charge of this bill, had claimed the floor the Chair would have recognized him. The Chair hopes that the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Missouri will arrange a division of the hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the time should be divided.

Mr. COSGROVE. That is all I want.

Mr. HOLMAN. But my friend must ascertain how much time——

Mr. MULDROW. Does the gentleman from Indiana say that the time should be equally divided?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it should be divided; and it is important to ascertain how much time the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] have already occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana for half an hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall have to object to that for the reason I was stating, that when this bill was under debate on last Friday the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Mississippi discussed it at length. I presume the gentlemen together occupied an hour. How is that?

Mr. MULDROW. I presume not. I suppose we occupied fifteen or twenty minutes. Very little time was occupied in discussing the bill; most of the time was spent in reading the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. Whatever time was occupied in reading the report, which was in behalf of the bill, and the time occupied by my two friends ought to be counted as time already occupied in favor of the measure. I apprehend that will be found to be about one hour.

Mr. MULDROW. It does not seem to me fair that the gentleman from Indiana should now occupy a whole hour. But very few members were present the last time the bill was discussed; and for the opposition to occupy the whole hour now allowed for discussion must, I think, strike the mind of the House as evidently unfair. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana will not insist upon any such procedure. My understanding when we went into Committee of the Whole was that we were to have one-half of the time.

Mr. COSGROVE. That was also my understanding.

Mr. MULDROW. If I had not so understood I should have insisted upon the House fixing a division of the time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say——

Mr. COSGROVE. I want to raise another point——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the hour is now running.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it will not be regarded as now running. This debate, of course, is by implied consent. What objection is there to allowing another hour for debate? This is one of the most important bills on the Calendar.

Mr. MULDROW. I have no objection to another hour.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let there be two hours, to be equally divided.

Mr. COSGROVE. But before the first hour is exhausted let us go back into the House and have the House fix the time.

Mr. MULDROW. In order to settle the question in the House, I move that the committee rise.

The motion of Mr. MULDROW was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that when the House goes into the committee further to consider Mrs. Gaines's bill the time for debate be limited to two hours, and that it shall be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose it.

The SPEAKER. The House has made an order to limit debate, and the only way is to reconsider that vote.

Mr. MULDROW. I move to reconsider that vote.

Mr. CALKINS. Was the motion made to reconsider and lay upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It was not. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which debate was limited in committee to one hour. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 64.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted. [Cries of "Oh, no!"] The Chair will appoint as tellers Mr. MULDROW and Mr. WARNER, of Ohio.

Mr. HOLMAN. They are both on the same side.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Tennessee in place of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I ask gentlemen to content themselves with a less time than two hours. This bill was discussed on last Friday when we were in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is not the point before the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I only wish to make that suggestion in order that we may reach some conclusion.

Mr. MULDROW. I suggest that the hour to which general debate is limited be equally divided between the respective sides.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will move then by unanimous consent the time be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose the bill.

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent. The House has already limited the debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is so fair a proposition it could not be refused if the bill had not already been debated on one side for more than an hour.

Mr. MULDROW. There was debate on the other side last Friday by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman from Tennessee moved that the House go into committee for the consideration of the Private Calendar, and further, that the debate on the pending bill be limited to thirty minutes. That was amended on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to extend the time to one hour. I ask if the original rule that it be equally divided can not apply to this one hour?

The SPEAKER. There was no rule.

Mr. COSGROVE. I understood it to be made.

The SPEAKER. It is never made in the House. The division of time can only be made by unanimous consent. The order of the House under the rule is simply to fix the time during which debate shall continue.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The propriety of that rule has been so universal there should be no objection to carrying it out in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no objection to it, and no one pretends to do anything against it. The only thing objected to is after the other side has already had an hour of debate on this proposition they now come in and ask for half of the other hour, which would make an hour and a half on one side and only half an hour on the other. I do not object to any reasonable division of time. After the House has allowed an hour in favor of the measure already, last Friday, I think the only honorable solution of the present difficulty is to give each side an hour to-day, and I hope the House will not object to that proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Mississippi will take their places as tellers.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope I may be indulged for one moment in order that we may reach some conclusion by which we will obviate the necessity of having a vote. Will the gentleman from Indiana be content with three-fourths of an hour in opposition to the bill, and then that there shall be half an hour in favor of it?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the present hour run against the bill, and then let half an hour be given in favor of it. Let that arrangement be made.

The SPEAKER. Let the proposition be submitted, and the Chair will put it to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let the present hour run against the bill, and then let the time be extended for half an hour in favor of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Say three-quarters of an hour in favor of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. No; my proposition is an hour against the bill and half an hour in favor of it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask by unanimous consent, in order to obviate a vote, that there be one hour of debate in opposition to the bill and half an hour to be given to those who favor it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think that will be satisfactory.

Mr. McMILLIN. There having been discussion the last time the bill was up in favor of it——

Mr. HEPBURN. I object.

Mr. MULDROW. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked that debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill under consideration shall be limited to one hour and a half, one hour of which is to be occupied by those in opposition to the bill, and a half hour to those in favor of it.

Mr. DUNHAM. I would like to inquire how much time has been already occupied in favor of the bill?

Mr. MULDROW. Not very much time in debate. The report was read, which consumed some time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request which the Chair has submitted?

Mr. HEPBURN. I withdraw the objection.

So (no further objection being made) the motion to limit debate was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLIN. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills upon the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. Cox, of New York, in the chair.

MRS. MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill for the relief of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I trust, on account of the important principle involved in this bill, that it will receive the careful attention of the committee, for I feel quite confident that a careful consideration of the bill will create a very grave doubt in the mind of any gentleman as to whether there is any validity in the claim presented.

Mr. Chairman, I find, on examining the papers on file in this case, a petition presented before the House on the 9th day of December, 1881, a petition signed by the claimant named in this bill, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. In that petition the land which is the subject of this claim is referred to in the following brief terms:

> Your memorialist further represents that subsequent to the confirmation of the title of said land to her father, the heirs of General La Fayette were suffered to locate a small fraction of their grant within the boundaries of the said 1,920 toises square of land, —— acres of land.

The writer of this paper, it will be seen, like most of us, seemed to have some difficulty in reducing the grant to acres.

The petition further states that a patent was granted to the La Fayette heirs by the Government of the United States. Now that is one of the elements of this claim, a small portion of the land, and I will use the exact terms of the petitioner herself:

> The heirs of General La Fayette were suffered to locate a small fraction of their grant within the boundaries of the said 1,920 toises square of land, —— acres of land, which were by patent granted to the said heirs of La Fayette by the Government of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, there is a very brief reference made in the report of the committee to the House on this bill, a very brief reference, indeed, to the fact that the claim does not come before Congress on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior, but it is so briefly made that it might well have been entirely overlooked. Now, the fact is that as far back as 1873, on the 14th of April of that year, the Department of the Interior submitted to Congress an exhaustive report upon this claim; and I desire to have read for the consideration of the committee the concluding portions of it, and for the purpose of enabling gentlemen to hear more distinctly I will ask the Clerk to read the portions of this report which I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

> This claim was presented to Commissioner James O. Cosby, and by him reported in the name of John Lynd as No. 19, in register C (Am. State Papers, Public Lands, D. Green's edition, vol. 3, p. 54), as being, in his opinion, not valid according to the laws, usages, and customs of the Spanish Government. By the heirs of John Lynd this claim was also presented to the United States district court for the eastern district of Louisiana, under the act of June 14, 1844, and by said court confirmed; but on appeal being taken to the United States Supreme Court, that court rejected the claim on the ground that the grant was made after the date of the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and was therefore void. Subsequently, under the act of June 22, 1860 (12 Stat., p. 85), Lynd's heirs again presented their claim to the United States district court, January 15, 1861, obtained a decree in their favor, and on appeal to the United States Supreme Court, said claim, to the extent of 32,025 arpents, was finally confirmed to the said heirs of John Lynd (11 Wall., p. 632). Since said decree by the Supreme Court, however, Lynd's heirs have filed a remittitur for 17,513.40 acres of land, thus reducing the area confirmed to 9,740.35 acres.
> In this case the claimant has not filed the sworn statement describing the supposed location of her claim, as required by section 1 of the act of June 22, 1860; neither is there any legal evidence of the authenticity of the grant to Lynd, except that found in the record of the court in the case of Lynd's heirs, and upon which the confirmation in their favor is founded; nor is there any evidence to show Daniel Clark's rights to any part of said land, except the sale to him, in 1812, of 5,470 arpents; nor any evidence whatever to connect the alleged title of the present claimant with that of John Lynd or Daniel Clark.
> The claim of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines to claim No. 6 is therefore rejected by this office.
> It will be observed that there are no original title-papers filed as a part of the case in any of the claims above mentioned; neither is the loss of said originals proved or even averred; nor are the documents introduced to show the contents of such original papers in any way authenticated so as to be competent as secondary evidence to be introduced after a proper foundation had been laid; and in part of the said claims there is no evidence to connect the alleged title of Daniel Clark with that of the Spanish grantees; and there is a total failure of evidence in all of said claims to show any title or interest of the present claimant thereto. Even the translations of such of these documents as are in a foreign language are not certified to have been correctly made, nor are they correct, notably in the translation of the word "arpent," which is uniformly translated "acre."
> Under none of the rules of evidence as administered in the courts of this country would the papers filed with and transmitted by the register and the receiver in these cases be received as proof of any right whatever; and in considering said papers I have not deemed it necessary to point out every instance in which they were inaccurate or otherwise faulty, as would have been done had they been of a character to be treated as evidence. In addition, however, to what has already been said, your attention is respectfully invited to the following: In claim No. 3, said to be founded on a sale by the Spanish authorities, the patent is alleged to have been made in 1801, or more than two years anterior to the date of the order of survey, all of which is clearly erroneous; for in such sales the order of survey must issue, the survey of lands be made and returned, the land appraised, and its appraised value paid, or its payment secured, before the issue of patent. In claim No. 4 it is not shown that Mrs. Taylor was the wife or widow of Gilbert Andry, or had any legal interest in the land alleged to have been conveyed by her to Danial Clark. In claim No. 5, the alleged figurative plans, six in number, represent in the aggregate 50,941 arpents, while the accompanying field-notes describe only five tracts, representing in the agregate 40,024 arpents, and the rights of Daniel Clark therein are claimed under a mortgage from Power, but the necessary acts to convey title to Clark after a failure to pay the consideration for said mortgage are not shown.
> In claim No. 6, Daniel Clark's title from John Lynd to 26,555 arpents of the land is claimed under a mortgage, in 1807, of an undivided 14,012½ arpents of tracts Nos. 1 to 11, inclusive, containing 32,025 arpents, yet no attempt is made to show the performance of the necessary acts to convey title to Clark after a failure to pay the consideration for said mortgage, and this, too, nothwithstanding Clark is alleged to have purchased 5,470 arpents of said land nearly five years after the date of said mortgage; and in the copy of said alleged "act of sale" filed in the case, the said land is stated to have been encumbered with but two mortgages, neither of which were in favor of Daniel Clark. It may also be added that a duly authenticated copy of a record has been filed with an application for scrip to satisfy the confirmation to Lynd's heirs for this identical land, by which copy it appears that said mortgage to Clark in 1807 had been annulled and extinguished by an act executed before B. Van Pradelles, notary, and dated August 10, 1880.
> The accompanying affidavit of Richard Robles, to the effect that the translations of "certificates of title-deeds of Beverly Chew, Thomas Urquhart, John Lynd, Don Philip Enoul Dugue, Thomas Power, and Juan Pollock, from the Spanish into the English language," were made by him to the best of his knowledge and ability, were sent up by the register and the receiver with their report on the above-mentioned claims, but said affidavit was not attached to any of the translations filed in support of said claims.
> Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
> WILLIS DRUMMOND,
> Commissioner.
> Hon. C. DELANO,
> Secretary of the Interior, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be observed, Mr. Chairman, that the conclusion of the Commissioner, which is the conclusion arrived at upon an exhaustive statement of facts, is that there was no valid foundation for this claim. It is stated incidentally, I see, in the report that some papers have been subsequently submitted to the Secretary of the Interior, and that he had said if those papers had been before him prior to this report being made the report would have been different.

Mr. MULDROW. That was the statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office. The Commissioner of the General Land Office now says if all the facts had been before him which now appear in the case his decision would have been different.

Mr. HOLMAN. Where is that?

Mr. MULDROW. It is in the hands of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE].

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to have it read.

The fact appears further from this report that as far back perhaps as 1799 these original grants are said to have been made; that as to the land in question the title depended on this mortgage, or two mortgages, and it is certainly shown very clearly that the title can not be derived from that source, as these mortgages had been extinguished. It is further shown that there is no connection between the title of General Clark and that under which Lynd asserted claim from the Spanish Government.

Mr. MULDROW. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow me now to interrupt him?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to read that paper.

Mr. MULDROW. I understood the gentleman desired to have it read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to have it read in my time.

Mr. MULDROW. Then I will ask the gentleman to permit it to be read at this time in connection with his remarks.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield for that purpose in a few moments. The claim after this lapse of time is of itself subject to grave doubts of its validity. The lapse of time can not be overlooked. In tracing back this claim to ascertain its validity you have got to go back nearly ninety years. And the report made by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and which comes before you from the Secretary of the Interior, shows with what uncertainty you attempt to trace a shadowy title like this back through a long series of years. If it is true that this land or any part of it was granted to La Fayette and became ultimately the property of his heirs, it is easy to understand what motives there were more than half a century ago to open up this investigation and assert this claim. But this matter remained in absolute abeyance until as late as 1860, when the act of Congress was passed authorizing this inquiry and for the purpose of settling the claims of Louisiana derived from Spain. That law being limited, I believe, to six years, was permitted to nearly expire before any steps whatever were taken. That law was extended three years until 1869; and in that period this imperfect statement, the total insufficiency of which is shown by the Commissioner, was filed in the General Land Office, and was the basis of the investigation made by Cosby on the ground and with the original records so far as there were records before him, and on which he based his report that the claim was without foundation. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] to have the report of the committee of a former Congress on this subject read, and that he may make such remarks as he may think proper.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. On last Friday I obtained the floor when this case was called up, and having a recollection that in the Forty-fifth Congress I was a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, and was one of the subcommittee appointed to take charge of this question and make a report on it, I attempted at that time, without having any opportunity to examine the record, to give briefly the result of the conclusions we reached after investigation. I have since then, just now, indeed, obtained the report made at that time, and will send it to the Clerk to have it read. I will say, however, before the Clerk commences to read, that the investigation made by the subcommittee, composed of Mr. Gunter, Mr. CALDWELL, and myself, was very thorough and patient on our part. We examined all the original documents. There were some documents which had not been translated. These were translated for us. And after getting at all the facts that could be presented by the attorney of Mrs. Gaines, who appeared before the committee and elaborately argued the case—after a thorough investigation of the whole of the facts presented to us we reached the conclusion embodied in this report, which I now ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Myra Clark Gaines, asking a confirmation of title to 85,207 arpents of land described in Ex. Doc. No. 60, first session of the Forty-third Congress, ask to make the following report:

Mrs. Gaines, by petition, avers that she is the sole heir of John Clark, deceased, and as such claims to be the owner, and asks Congress to confirm to her title to 85,207 arpents of land situate in the State of Louisiana, and in case said lands have been appropriated by the Government, to issue to her an equivalent in certificates.

This claim is founded upon three several supposed Spanish grants: One to Thomas Urquhart, for 50,000 arpents of land, dated November 29, 1803; the second to Philip E. Dugue, for 40,000 arpents, dated January 17, 1801, and the third to John Lynd, dated July 12, 1806, for 32,025 arpents.

Your committee, on examination of the exhibits and other proofs filed, find that the said Thomas Urquhart, previous to the date of the alleged grant to him by the Spanish authorities, presented a plan and survey of 50,000 arpents to Morales, intendant of the then Spanish province, and requested a conveyance or patent for the lands surveyed and described in said plan and surveys.

The conveyance from Morales to Urquhart, dated November 29, 1803, is not for the 50,000 arpents, as averred in the petition of Mrs. Gaines, but for 10,263 arpents only. (See translation of Exhibit 3, Ex. Doc. No. 60, first session of the Forty-third Congress, page 36.)

On the 3d day of December, 1803, the said Urquhart conveyed to Daniel Clark (father of Mrs. Gaines) the 50,000 arpents described in his original plan and surveys, which is 39,773 arpents in excess of the original grant by Morales to him above mentioned, and the amount claimed and asked to be confirmed by Mrs. Gaines on account of the said grant to Urquhart.

A mere mention of these facts is sufficient to clearly demonstrate that Clark only acquired title to 10,263 arpents under the grant from Urquhart to him, as he (Urquhart) only acquired title to that amount by the original grant from the Spanish authorities.

It is admitted in the petition, and the proof shows, that on the 31st day of May, 1867, Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, as the only heir of John Clark, deceased, conveyed by regular deed to Caleb Cushing the 10,263 arpents of land described in the original conveyance by Morales to Urquhart, and embraced in the deed from Urquhart to Daniel Clark, and that the same has been confirmed to him (Cushing) by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States and scrip issued for the same. Under this state of facts, your committee are unanimous in the opinion that the claim of Mrs. Gaines to the 39,773 arpents of land on account of the Urquhart grant from the Spanish authorities should be rejected.

It is also alleged in said petition that Morales, intendant-general of the then Spanish province of West Florida, on the 17th day of January, 1801, conveyed to Philip E. Dugue 40,000 arpents of land; that afterward Dugue conveyed the same to Thomas Powers and he to Daniel Clark for a valuable consideration.

The documents filed in support of this claim are—

1. Copies of alleged figurative plans and field-notes of survey for seven tracts of land, purporting to have been surveyed by Carlos Trudeau in 1804, in favor of Philip E. Dugue, pursuant to an order of survey dated October 27, 1803, the seven tracts aggregating 40,000 arpents.

2. Uncertified copy of alleged patent from Morales to Dugue, dated January 17, 1801, for the above-mentioned lands.

3. Uncertified paper writing, purporting to be translation of the above alleged patent.

4. A petition dated March 16, 1869, to the register and receiver, acting as land commissioners, signed by W. H. Wilden as attorney for Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines. This petition is not verified under oath, though it is signed and has a jurat attached.

5. The claimant failed to file with the register and receiver the sworn statement as to the supposed location of her claim, as required by section 1 of the act of June 22, 1850; neither has any legal evidence been presented of the authenticity of the alleged grant by the Spanish authorities to Philip E. Dugue; nor is there any evidence showing or establishing a chain of title from Dugue to the present claimant.

It will be observed that there are no original title papers filed as evidence in support of either of the above-named grants; neither is the loss of said originals averred or proven; nor are the documents introduced to show the contents of such original papers in any way authenticated so as to be competent as secondary evidence to be introduced after a proper foundation had been laid; and there is a total failure of evidence to show a conveyance of title from Dugue to Thomas Powers, and from Powers to Daniel Clark, through whom Mrs. Gaines claims title.

In considering said papers your committee have not deemed it necessary to point out all inaccuracies, as would have been done had they been of a character to be treated as evidence. Under none of the rules of evidence recognized and enforced in the courts of this country would the papers filed in this case and transmitted by the register and receiver of the local land office be received as proof of any of the rights claimed by petitioner.

In addition, it will be observed that in the claim founded upon a supposed sale and grant by the Spanish authorities to Dugue, the patent is alleged to have been made in 1801 (and the exhibits sustain the averment), more than two years anterior to the date of the order of survey, all of which is clearly erroneous; for in such sales the order of survey must issue, the survey of the lands be made and returned, the land appraised and its appraised value paid, before the issue of patent.

In the opinion of your committee, the evidence wholly fails to establish the right of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines to the 40,000 arpents of land claimed under the alleged grant from the Spanish authorities to Philip E. Dugue, dated January 17, 1801, and recommend that said claim be rejected.

The last of these claims to be considered is for 5,470 arpents of land conveyed by the Spanish authorities to John Lynd, and afterwards by Lynd to Daniel Clark.

The evidence filed in this case shows that on the 12th day of July, 1806, Morales conveyed to John Lynd eleven tracts of land, numbering from one to eleven, inclusive, and amounting in the aggregate to 32,025 arpents. On the 12th of August, 1812, the said Lynd conveyed to Daniel Clark the 5,470 arpents described in plan number 6 of the original conveyance from Spain to Lynd, as shown by Exhibit 7, filed in this case.

The exhibits filed in this case as evidence of title are not the original conveyances, but certified copies, without proof that the originals were lost or mislaid, and would not alone be satisfactory as to the transfers claimed in the petition of Mrs. Gaines. But on the 15th of January, 1861, the heirs of John Lynd, deceased, presented their claim to the United States district court, for a confirmation of title to the 32,025 arpents of land described in the original conveyance from the Spanish authorities to Lynd, which conveyance the court in all respects sustained as legal and valid under the act of Congress passed June 22, 1860, and at the December term, 1870, on an appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decree of the court below to the full extent of the grant. (See 11 Wallace, page 632.)

On the 20th day of December, 1872, the Lynd heirs entered a remittitur for 5,470 arpents on account of the conveyance from John Lynd to Daniel Clark, made on the 12th day of August, 1812, previously referred to in this report, and of which the following is a correct copy:

November term, 1872.—Widow and heirs of John Lynd vs. United States; No. 5.

FRIDAY, 20 December, 1872.

Present, his honor E. H. Durell.

On motion of L. Janin, esq., solicitor for plaintiffs herein, and on suggesting to the court that on the 8th day of July, 1869, the said plaintiffs obtained a decree in this court for scrip for 27,253.75 acres of land, equivalent to 32,025 arpents, by them claimed, which decree was on appeal affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States at December term, 1870, as reported in the eleventh volume of Wallace's Reports, page 602;

And on further suggestion of the fact of which they and their counsel were heretofore ignorant, and which has been recently ascertained and brought to their attention, that John Lynd, through whom they claim, by act passed before P. Pedesclaux, notary public in this city, on the 11 August, 1808, sold to John Forbes & Co. 15,134 arpents of the land embraced in their said claim, and that on the 12th August, 1812, he also sold, by act passed before Michael the Armas, the further quantity of 5,470 arpents of the land embraced in their said claim, making in the aggregate 20,604 arpents, equivalent to 17,513.40 acres so by him sold, which being deducted from the decree in plaintiffs favor for 27,253.75 acres in scrip, would leave a balance in scrip of 9,740.35 acres;

And on further suggestion that the attorney of the United States for this district has been directed by the Attorney-General of the United States, under date of 25 June, 1872, to file a bill of review for the purpose of withdrawing from said decree the portions of the land so sold;

And on further suggestion that said plaintiffs protest against the abatement of said 5,470 arpents, claimed to have been sold to Daniel Clark, to any other persons, and that plaintiffs intend to contest before the proper tribunal any other person's claim thereto; and further, on referring to the letter to this effect of date 29 November, 1872, addressed by said plaintiffs to J. R. Beckwith, esq., attorney of the United States for this district, herewith filed—

It is ordered that the said plaintiffs, by their counsel, be now allowed to enter a remittitur of scrip for 17,513.40 acres of land, and that the said decree in their favor be accordingly amended by making a deduction therefrom of the quantity of land so sold by said John Lynd, to wit, 17,513.40, thus reducing the same to a decree for 9,740.35 acres in scrip.

New Orleans, December 17, 1872.

LOUIS JANIN, of Counsel for Plaintiff.

The original grant from the Spanish intendant to John Lynd being held legal and valid by the Supreme Court of the United States, the deed from Lynd to Daniel Clark (father of Mrs. Gaines) formal, and the remittitur being entered for the land conveyed by Lynd to Clark, in the opinion of your committee the right of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, as the only heir of Daniel Clark, deceased, to the 5,470 arpents claimed under the Lynd grant, is fully sustained, and patents should be issued to her where the lands have not been appropriated by the Government, and an equivalent in certificates or land scrip where they have been.

To secure the rights of the claimant (Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines), your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. TOWNSHEND rose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask my colleague, how much did the bill accompanying that report allow?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The bill did not pass.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much did it allow?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It provided for allowing 5,470 arpents.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman state what were the provisions of the bill which the committee recommended?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The conclusion of the committee was, after an investigation of all the evidence presented, that Mrs. Gaines was not entitled to more than 5,470 arpents; and there was doubt in the minds of the committee whether she was really entitled to anything. The bill, I believe, never passed. It was reported to the House, lay on the Calendar, but never got through.

Mr. COSGROVE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit me——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I wish first to answer my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER]. I will briefly recapitulate the results of the finding of the committee. It will be seen that the claims of Mrs. Gaines at that time, as set forth in her petition to Congress, were based upon three grants that were made by the Spanish Government: one to Thomas Urquhart for 50,000 arpents of land, one to Philip E. Dugue for 40,000 arpents, and the third to John Lynd for 5,470 arpents, making some ninety and odd thousand arpents of land. Mrs. Gaines has abandoned her claim now, I believe, under the Dugue grant.

The result of the investigation made in that Congress has convinced even Mrs. Gaines that she is entitled to nothing under the Dugue grant, and therefore it is not necessary for me to discuss the result of the investigation of that grant that was made in that Congress.

I will say further that at that time Mrs. Gaines, through her counsel, ex-Senator Foote, of Mississippi, had full opportunity to present before that committee all the evidence that could possibly be obtained, and the committee gave weeks and months, as my recollection is, to a patient and most thorough investigation of all the facts that surround the case.

The Urquhart claim, as has been shown by the reading of the report, rests upon a grant that was in reality for only about 10,000 arpents. The record shows, the title-papers show, the correct translation of the original grant of the Spanish Government and all the evidence show that Mrs. Gaines was entitled to only about 10,000 arpents under that claim. And evidence in her own handwriting shows that she had conveyed those 10,000 arpents to her counsel, Caleb Cushing.

Mr. MULDROW. The gentleman is in error evidently in his statement of facts. I am sure he does not desire to make a statement of fact before the House which is unfounded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I will only say that we found this to be true.

Mr. MULDROW. There were 10,000 arpents in one grant, and those were conveyed to Caleb Cushing. But there were other grants than the one which was conveyed to Caleb Cushing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have read only hastily the report of the present committee of this House. I understand that that committee takes the ground which was taken by the committee of the last Congress, that Mrs. Gaines had not completed her evidence before the Commissioner of the Land Office for the whole 50,000 arpents; that there was something lacking in the evidence. Am I correct in that?

Mr. COSGROVE. She had not then filed her affidavit, but she did so under the general act.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. She then filed her petition, came before the Commissioner of the General Land Office with it, and the Commissioner found that she had not according to law shown that she was entitled to a larger allowance than the 10,000 arpents which were afterward conveyed to Caleb Cushing.

Mr. HOLMAN. And the grant for the 10,000 arpents which was conveyed to Caleb Cushing was found to be a valid grant?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That was found to be a valid grant, and it was conveyed by her to her counsel.

Mr. MULDROW. And the Supreme Court in finding that grant valid virtually passed upon the whole title of the entire 50,000 arpents.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me get through with my statement of what we found at that time. I have no desire in making this statement to do anything more than to contribute what light and knowledge I have upon this subject. I want to see the ends of justice attained in this case as well as in all others. I simply desire to put before the House the result of our investigation in the Forty-fifth Congress, and to state the reasons why we made this report, so that future Congresses might have before them the result of our investigation in this case. I am very glad the report is on record so that members may be enabled to reach a just conclusion in the case.

What did we then find? We found that the title was incomplete; and it is now confessed to be so by Mrs. Gaines, who has, as I understand, since been able to get up some affidavit by a man named Cox, or something else, and has taken that affidavit before the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who has indicated in a kind of way that if he had had that affidavit before him at the time he might possibly have recommended the confirmation of the 50,000 arpents.

Mr. MULDROW. Allow me to state that the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office is not based upon that affidavit, but is predicated mainly upon the fact that the act of 1860 provided that wherever there was a survey and a segregation from the common domain of a land claim, that gave the party such a right as to enable him to come before Congress for a confirmation of his title.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is enough now; let me go on. I have heard nothing said, I have seen nothing in the report of the committee or elsewhere that changes my conviction. In that Congress we found that only 10,263 arpents had been granted to Urquhart; that he had acquired title to only that amount of land. I will read further from the report what we found:

It is admitted in the petition, and the proof shows, that on the 31st day of May, 1867, Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, as the only heir of John Clark, deceased, conveyed by regular deed to Caleb Cushing the 10,263 arpents of land described in the original conveyance by Morales to Urquhart, and embraced in the deed from Urquhart to Daniel Clark, and that the same has been confirmed to him (Cushing) by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States and scrip issued for the same.

That is the decree that gentlemen are harping upon as a basis to a further allowance for some 39,000 arpents of land. I read further in regard to the Urquhart grant:

Under this state of facts your committee are unanimous in the opinion that the claim of Mrs. Gaines to the 39,773 arpents of land on account of the Urquhart grant from the Spanish authorities should be rejected.

That disposes of all that is claimed under the Urquhart grant. The present committee has disposed of all that Mrs. Gaines claimed at that time under the Dugue grant; but she and her counsel were as persistent in their demands under that grant as she is now in insisting upon her rights under the Urquhart grant. But she has abandoned her claim under the Dugue grant. We come now to the Lynd grant. I again read from the report:

The evidence filed in this case shows that on the 12th day of July, 1806, Morales conveyed to John Lynd eleven tracts of land, numbering from 1 to 11, inclusive, and amounting in the aggregate to 32,025 arpents. On the 12th of August, 1812, the said Lynd conveyed to Daniel Clark the 5,470 arpents described in plan No. 6 of the original conveyance from Spain to Lynd, as shown by Exhibit 7, filed in this case.

The exhibits filed in this case as evidence of title are not the original conveyances, but certified copies, without proof that the originals were lost or mislaid, and would not alone be satisfactory as to the transfers claimed in the petition of Mrs. Gaines. But on the 15th of January, 1861, the heirs of John Lynd, deceased—

presented their claim to the United States district court for a confirmation of title to the 32,025 arpents of land described in the original conveyance from the Spanish authorities to Lynd, which conveyance the court in all respects sustained as legal and valid under the act of Congress passed June 22, 1860, and at the December term, 1870, on an appeal, the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decree of the court below to the full extent of the grant. (See 11 Wallace, page 632.)

On the 20th day of December, 1872, the Lynd heirs entered a remittitur for 5,470 arpents on account of the conveyance from John Lynd to Daniel Clark, made on the 12th day of August, 1812, previously referred to in this report.

From an investigation of documents in the Spanish and English languages which would almost fill a dry-goods box we were not able to discover that she was entitled on any consideration whatever to more than 5,470 arpents; to that extent we reported in favor of her claim. I have not time to refer to the details of the testimony.

Mr. LAIRD. Was that the excess of land for which the Lynd heirs entered a remittitur?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Supreme Court of the United States confirmed the Lynd grant to the extent of 32,025 acres; but it was subsequently found upon evidence that 5,000 arpents and more had been conveyed to the ancestors of Mrs. Gaines. Therefore, after the Supreme Court had confirmed the whole grant, the Lynd heirs came in and entered a remittitur for these 5,470 arpents.

We found that the title of Mrs. Gaines was good as to those 5,470 arpents, and therefore reported a bill granting her that quantity of land. I believe that if the same conclusion should now be reached by this Committee of the Whole the ends of justice will be attained, and she will get all that she is entitled to.

It is clear Mrs. Gaines has been convinced that her claim based upon the grant to Dugue was unfounded; and she has absolutely abandoned that claim. As I understand, she comes here now simply with affidavits—ex parte affidavits no doubt, the parties to which were not subjected to cross-examination, no effort having been made on the part of the Government to search up testimony contradicting the statements made in these ex parte affidavits. Upon these affidavits, as I understand, the committee of the last Congress and the committee of the present Congress base the allowance of the claim of Mrs. Gaines to some 39,000 arpents of land.

I do not wish to say anything more. I have not the slightest feeling in this case; I merely wanted to contribute to this discussion whatever knowledge I may have in regard to the case.

Mr. LAIRD. Is the gentleman satisfied as to the identity of the land he speaks of and that which this committee has reported in favor of giving to Mrs. Gaines?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The lands the title to which is discussed in the present report are identically the same as those the title to which was considered by the committee in the Forty-fifth Congress. There is no question about that. It is admitted in the report that they are the same.

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand the gentleman that so far as the committee of which he speaks decided in favor of the title of Mrs. Gaines there is no question about the matter.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. As to the 5,470 arpents?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. There was some question; but I believe it best perhaps to err on the side of mercy, and I would vote to give her 5,470 arpents.

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like to ask my colleague a question. If we allow the title of Mrs. Gaines to the 5,470 arpents covered by the report made in the Forty-fifth Congress, then I understand the only matter in dispute relates to the 39,000 arpents under the Urquhart grant.

Now let me see if I understand the matter. That case has been the subject of litigation in the Supreme Court of the United States. The claimant in this bill deeded 8,000 acres——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Ten thousand acres.

Mr. SPRINGER. Deeded 10,000 acres to Caleb Cushing.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And that was all she was entitled to under the grant.

Mr. SPRINGER. That question was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Yes, sir; and the title of Cushing was confirmed.

Mr. SPRINGER. Now, I desire to know whether that litigation did not in fact embrace the whole of the claim known as the Urquhart grant?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. It is my understanding that the court passed upon the whole question as to what Mrs. Gaines was entitled to under the Urquhart grant, and held that she was only entitled to that number of acres.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then my colleague holds that the question has been adjudicated by the Supreme Court against the claimant in this case?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I think it has.

Mr. MULDROW. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] is mistaken as to the decision in the Cushing case. The court did not decide that Mrs. Gaines was not entitled under the Urquhart grant to other lands than those which had been conveyed to Cushing.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is a question of fact which I would like to have settled.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me read the facts on that point as stated in the report to which I have already referred:

It is admitted in the petition, and the proof shows, that on the 31st day of May, 1867, Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, as the only heir of John Clark, deceased, conveyed by regular deed to Caleb Cushing the 10,263 arpents of land described in the original conveyance by Morales to Urquhart, and embraced in the deed from Urquhart to Daniel Clark, and that the same has been confirmed to him (Cushing) by decree of the Supreme Court of the United States and scrip issued for the same. Under this state of facts, your committee are unanimous in the opinion that the claim of Mrs. Gaines to the 39,773 arpents of land on account of the Urquhart grant from the Spanish authorities should be rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the remaining portion of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was a claim not for an undivided portion, but the whole of it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. That is my recollection of the understanding of what Caleb Cushing claimed.

Mr. MULDROW. How much time has the gentleman from Indiana left?

The CHAIRMAN. He has eleven minutes, which he proposes to reserve.

Mr. COSGROVE. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ROBINSON] who introduced this bill.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Mr. Chairman, having introduced this bill, it is proper that I should say a word or two in its favor.

Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines is a marked character in history and the story of her life a romance and a mystery.

Just about eighty years ago there lived in New Orleans a young Irishman, handsome, polished, brave, and energetic; a favorable specimen of that race which has given to America so much of its wit, beauty, and bravery; so many of its wealthy merchants, eloquent orators, and gallant soldiers. He was a leading merchant of that gay city, and in adventurous journeys and dealings among the Indians and the French settlers on the Mississippi had amassed a large fortune, which was vastly increased by inheritance from his uncle.

In all his transactions he was prosperous and everything he touched turned to gold. On the tide of pleasure he carried full sail. No door of fashion nor any woman's heart was closed against the young and fascinating merchant of that tropical city. It was a city of wealthy bachelors, of gayety and pleasure and luxury; of merchant princes and successful traders. Haughty grandees and notable representatives of the old French and Spanish society mingled in its marts or reclined beneath its magnolias. At the head of its wealth and in its gayest circles of elegance and luxury stood Daniel Clark, a native of Sligo, in Ireland, and the father of Myra Clark Gaines. In business he was bold and skillful, in character restless, imperious, and ambitious, submitting to no control except his own will, and amenable for his acts only under the code of honor, so well understood in his neighboring Galway.

Justice Wayne, of the Supreme Court, described him as "a man of no ordinary character or influence on those who were about him. His natural fitness to control became habitual as his wealth and standing increased, and it was exercised and involuntarily yielded to by all who associated or were in business with him. He was a man of high qualities, energetic, enterprising, courageous, affectionate, and generous, but with a pride which had yielded to no mortification until his affection subdued it to a sense of justice in behalf of his child."

In this same gay city on the crescent of the Mississippi, there lived Zulime Carriere, known as the wife of Monsieur De Granges, by birth a nobleman of France, but in business a shopkeeper in New Orleans. Zulime was a girl of exquisite and voluptuous beauty, such as would have justly furnished a theme for the pen of the author of Lalla Rookh. At the age of 13 or 14 she married Jerome De Granges, and was about 20 when Daniel Clark made her acquaintance, and became her husband on their discovery of the fact that her marriage with De Granges was void, because a previous wife to whom he had been married in France was still living.

The marriage of Daniel Clark and Zulime was private. The ceremony was duly performed by a priest; her sister, Madame Despau, and two friends of Mr. Clark from Louisiana and New York being witnesses.

In the city of New Orleans, in the month of December, 1806, Zulime gave birth to a daughter, Myra, the present claimant in the bill before this House. She never knew her father, and until she grew to womanhood knew nothing of her mother nor of her own history. She was born in the house of M. Boisfontaine, a refugee from San Domingo, and the friend and confidential agent of Mr. Clark, who placed Myra, immediately after her birth, in the charge of his brother-in-law, Col. S. B. Davis.

In 1806 Mr. Clark was elected to Congress as a Delegate from the Territory of "Orleans," and took his seat on the 1st day of December in that year, representing the Territory as its first Delegate in the short term of the Ninth Congress and both terms of the Tenth, and was succeeded in the Eleventh Congress by Julian Poydras, who took his seat the last day of May, 1809. When Mr. Clark first entered Congress Gen. George Clinton, of New York, was President of the Senate, and Nathaniel Macon, of North Carolina, was Speaker of the House. There werethen three Territories—Indiana, Mississippi, and Orleans. Among the members of the Senate were Henry Clay, of Kentucky, and John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts, and among the members of the House were Theodore Dwight of Connecticut, Josiah Quincy of Massachusetts, Matthew Lyon of Kentucky, and John Randolph of Virginia. Ohio had then only one member in the House, while Massachusetts had seventeen and Virginia twenty-three. In the Twelfth Congress, November 11, 1811, Louisiana was admitted as a State, with Thomas B. Robertson as its sole Representative, two years before the death of Daniel Clark.

Myra was born the same month in which her father took his seat in Congress, and, as his marriage was not publicly known, the wealthy and handsome Delegate was a welcome guest in the gayest circles of Washington and Baltimore, and enjoyed the society of the celebrated beauties of the latter city, to one of the loveliest of whom, a granddaughter of the last and illustrious signer of the Declaration of Independence and afterward wife of a noble marquis and lord-lieutenant of Ireland, it was said he became engaged. A story (perhaps only a story) is told of a journey undertaken from New Orleans to Baltimore by Zulime to find whether the rumor was true, and that from her carriage in front of the princely mansion of the father of the lady with whom rumor had associated his name she saw him with the captivating beauty promenading on the piazza.

In 1812 Colonel Davis, with his family and his reputed daughter Myra, moved to Philadelphia, and afterward to a handsome residence in the suburbs of Wilmington, in Delaware. Here she became acquainted with a young gentleman, William Wallace Whitney, of a numerous and wealthy family of Binghamton, in New York, and they became lovers, and after many romantic adventures, including a midnight ride to Wilmington, alone, in a stormy night, to warn her lover that his life was threatened if he dared again to visit Colonel Davis's mansion, they were married. Previous to the marriage her reputed father had become reconciled with her lover, and the marriage took place at his mansion, after some difficulty on the day of the wedding in procuring a license, which was not obtained till near midnight.

This was in 1832. She had grown up to womanhood, and not until her marriage at 26 did she realize the truth that the wealth of the New Orleans millionaire was hers, hers as his only legitimate child and by his will of 1813, the year in which he died, which had been concealed and destroyed, which declared Myra Davis his daughter and only legitimate child, and which left to her the whole of his estate. It was proved on substantial testimony and confirmed in 1861 after a legal warfare of thirty years. Part of that estate is the subject of this bill, and here, as everywhere else, this brave and beautiful little woman is met with unaccountable opposition. Why is that opposition renewed now and here? Part of this very claim transferred to General Cushing has been allowed in our courts without opposition. We seem to be bent on fighting alone with worthy women. That fact would lead us almost to curse our sex. This perpetual warfare against women is not manly. Why do we now oppose granting justice to this noble lady on the plea that it is granting too much land to any single individual? If we are earnest in this matter let us assail the possessions of the Astors or other male monopolists, and not take away the legal, just, and honest possessions of this venerable and heroic woman.

In her legal war of half a century she has met with malignant opposition. In her case the law's delays have been fearfully provoking and expensive. Legally entitled to millions, she has sometimes hardly known how to obtain a penny for the sustenance of her life. Even now she feels the pangs of poverty amid the plenitude of her possessions. One of her biographers has said:

The little fortune received at her marriage soon melted. She had spent the whole of her husband's estate. She had borrowed of his family, and she had borrowed of every one who was bold enough to listen to her persuasive voice, for she "talked the money out of their pockets." Nobody could listen fifteen minutes to her without sharing in her enthusiasm and perfect conviction of ultimate success. She had feed the ablest lawyers in the land with princely retainers when she had money, and she had more than once pleaded her own case when money could not be obtained. She knew the law perfectly. She had mastered details as well as principles. She knew precedents and did not stumble upon quibbles. Once it is said she spoke two hours and a half to a jury and won her case.

I only wish I could yield to her for fifteen minutes now to hear how eloquently and successfully she would overwhelm the opponents of her claims in the bill.

Born in 1806; the daughter of an Irish gentleman, inheriting her father's courage and her mother's beauty; in early life marrying the object of her love; going with him to her native city to contend for her rights and to reclaim her inheritance; her young husband dying of yellow fever in the first legal encounter; finding again a devoted protector in the gallant Major-General Gaines, who nearly eighty years ago, then a young lieutenant, arrested Aaron Burr and brought him to Richmond for trial about the time she was born, and afterward so distinguished himself in the war of 1812 against England at the battles of Chrystler's Fields and Fort Erie; her father nearly eighty years ago a Delegate in this Congress, in which the rights of his daughter are now so strenuously resisted; venerable in years, yet full of life and radiant in her unfading beauty; reading without glasses the finest print, and writing with steady hand her matchless manuscript, rivaling the finest copper-plate, with an eye undimmed and a heart undaunted; her ringing laugh and silver voice the still vigorous echoes of charming music which has thrilled with pleasure the most refined circles of Northern, Southern, and metropolitan society, she comes to-day and asks this Congress to restore to her a small portion of the property which has been so long and so unjustly kept from her. She is now a resident of this city, surrounded by six of her grandchildren and others, including the venerable French maid who so faithfully waited on her mother until her death, over thirty years ago, all dependent on her and in need of support, which she could and would so plentifully give them if she were allowed to possess her own property, part of which this Congress now hinders her from obtaining.

It is over forty years since I first met her, with her venerable and heroic husband, at New Haven, to which they had come to visit his son and my classmate then lying sick in Yale College, blockaded with snow. From time to time since then I have had the pleasure of meeting her, often victorious and still belligerent, during her long and valiant struggle for her rights. Like all who have known her I highly esteem her, and it is with pride and pleasure that I am here to-day to demand from this House the immediate passage of this bill for her partial relief.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MULDROW. If I can get the attention of the House for a few minutes, I think I will satisfy the judgment of every man who will listen that if there ever was a meritorious case before the House, one that demanded what the petitioner asked, the case of Mrs. Gaines is that one.

Now, sir, to begin at the outset, there is no controversy whatever as to this grant. No committee has ever found, and it is not pretended, that there was not a grant from the Spanish intendant then in charge of the affairs of Spain in that part of the territory which covered this land. There has never been a question that Morales, as such intendant, made a valid grant to John Lynd of a part of the land claimed by this petitioner.

That fact I say is not controverted. The committee in the Forty-fourth Congress, to which reference has been made, found that fact. The very committee of which the gentleman from Illinois himself was a member found that to be true; and the committees in the Forty-seventh and the committee in this the Forty-eighth Congress all found that there was no question that there had been a grant from Morales, the Spanish intendant, to John Lynd.

In the possession of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] is the absolute deed in fee of the 5,000 arpents from John Lynd to Daniel Clark.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. We admit that, so far as the 5,000 arpents are concerned.

Mr. MULDROW. Very well. Then the only question is this: Is this petitioner the heir and legatee of Daniel Clark? If so, that settles the controversy.

Now, that point has been decided in a number of cases that have risen in the prosecution of her claims and which have gone before the Supreme Court, and the first case reported in 6 Wallace, of Gaines vs. The City of New Orleans, reviewed the whole history of Daniel Clark's grant and the rights of Mrs. Gaines under the will of Daniel Clark, and reached the conclusion that not only was Mrs. Gaines the legatee of Daniel Clark under the will of 1813, the last will, but also that various pieces of property in New Orleans and in other parts of Louisiana which had been conveyed by the executors of the first will of Clark, made in 1811, were absolutely null and void, and that Mrs. Gaines was entitled to the property of her father, Daniel Clark, with the exception of that portion which had been conveyed by order of the courts of Louisiana by Relf and Chew, the executors of Daniel Clark, that is, all that had been conveyed by them within twelve months after filing their letters testamentary. It seems that by the statutes of Louisiana at that time executors were forbidden to transfer property after twelve months from the date of their letters testamentary, and the Supreme Court declared that all conveyances made after that time were null and passed no right or title.

Now, does not that statement of facts show a clear right and title in Mrs. Gaines to the 5,000 acres of land which her father obtained from Lynd? There can be no possible question of that. But further, she claims the residue of the 50,000 arpents which were originally conveyed to Clark, other than that portion which she herself had conveyed to Caleb Cushing, amounting to something over 10,000 acres, in payment of his counsel fees in prosecuting her various claims.

Mr. Chairman, it is a part of the history of this country that no woman has ever made such heroic endeavors in the assertion of her rights over such a long period of years and under so many difficulties and under such adverse circumstances as has the petitioner in this case. As stated by the gentleman from New York, not knowing even until the time of her marriage that she was the heir of her father, not knowing who her father was up to that period, except from mere rumor, and then discovering it by accident, I say that no woman has ever been compelled to resort to such heroic endeavors as she has been compelled to resort to by reason of the circumstances attending her life in support of her just claims.

There have been no less than ten or twelve cases which have been carried up to the Supreme Court of the United States in order to vindicate some of the claims to the title of this lady to a part of her father's property; and to-day, with all of the vast estate which Daniel Clark left in this country and Louisiana, amounting, it was supposed, to millions of dollars at the time of his death, this woman, in consequence of the vast expense attending all of this litigation in the pursuit of her claim, is to-day almost a pauper.

Again, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLAND. Let me ask the gentleman a question——

Mr. MULDROW. I would prefer not to yield for a question unless it is directly pertinent to this point.

Mr. BLAND. I will not interrupt the gentleman if he prefers it.

Mr. MULDROW. I have only fifteen minutes, and I desire now to explain what rights Mrs. Gaines has under the Urquhart grant. There were nine grants in all made by Morales, the Spanish intendant, to Thomas Urquhart. The testimony shows that there is no question about the nine grants having been issued. The very grant that went before the Supreme Court, under which Caleb Cushing claimed 10,000 acres of this land, recited that at the time of the purchase of these 10,000 acres Urquhart purchased over or about 40,000 acres additional. The papers are there to show that there was an actual survey and location of the 50,000 arpents; and that they were set off to him by the Spanish Government. But the merit of the case does not stop even there. The papers show that he paid the money for the 50,000 arpents to the Spanish Government; and that point has not been controverted, nor has it been controverted or questioned by the gentleman, a member of the Committee on Private Land Claims, who prepared the report of the committee in the Forty-fifth Congress.

Then there is no question that the 50,000 arpents were granted to Thomas Urquhart when the 10,000 were granted which were confirmed by the decree of the Supreme Court to Caleb Cushing as a part of his payment for fees as counsel for Mrs. Gaines in the various suits brought by her in the several courts of this country. Now, then, you ask where is the evidence of title from Urquhart to Daniel Clark? We have the deed now here in the possession of the gentleman from Missouri, and I regret that I have not time to have it read in the short time which I have as a part of my own remarks; but if any gentleman questions its authenticity or its existence I will only say that it is there to be seen and examined by any member of the committee. The deed from Urquhart of the 50,000 arpents to Daniel Clark recited that Urquhart obtained the 50,000 arpents from the Spanish intendant then of the city of New Orleans at the time that the grant was made. In the first report read by the gentleman from Indiana he cited from the American State Papers to show that the Supreme Court at one time held that all grants of this character were not to be recognized; or rather that none of the grants of this character were to be recognized by the courts of this country.

The report went on to give his reason for that decision: that the United States at one time claimed that when France and Spain entered into the treaty known as the treaty of San Ildefonso, in the year 1800, Spain had yielded up any rights she had had in that territory to the French, and that the treaty of 1803 between the United States and the French Government conveyed all the claims of France to that territory to the United States; and that therefore Spain, having no title or right to that territory, the United States could not recognize her right to make title to any one. But the Supreme Court in this case of Lynd, to which reference has been made, has declared that by the act of 1860 the United States Government has recognized the rights of all parties who claim under the Spanish intendant in the actual possession of and exercising dominion over that territory from 1800 to 1810. Now, these grants were made by Morales between 1800 and 1810, and are fairly protected and provided for in that decision of the Supreme Court in that case.

Mr. BLAND. As the gentleman is on that branch of the case he will pardon me for asking him why the courts did not settle the whole case.

Mr. MULDROW. The act of 1860 provided two remedies. One was through the courts and one was through a board of commissioners. Caleb Cushing pursued his remedy through the courts; and therefore his claim went directly to the Supreme Court of the United States. But there was another remedy also provided, that the party making application should petition a board of commissioners under the act of 1860. Mrs. Gaines's lawyers pursued that course. But the act provides that where that course is pursued Congress shall afterward confirm the grant to the parties who present their claim to these commissioners and pursue that remedy. And, therefore, the case is now here. The commissioners allowed the claim. It was first rejected by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, because the court, it was contended, held that the United States would not recognize this character of grants. But that was before the act of 1860 was passed. And a further ground upon which he rejected it was that there were certain technical requirements made by the act of 1860 which had not been complied with. One was the making of affidavits in regard to the quantity of land embraced and describing it by metes and bounds. But when those technical defects were remedied, then the Commissioner of the General Land Office said it was a good grant and the title ought to be confirmed. And that report is in the possession of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE].

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] has expired.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Before the gentleman from Mississippi takes his seat will he allow me to ask him a question? He speaks of a decision having been rendered on the Urquhart grant, as I understand him, confirming the title of Mrs. Gaines, where Caleb Cushing got 10,263 arpents. And the gentleman claims, as I understand, that that covered also the 32,000 arpents.

Mr. MULDROW. The 32,000 arpents?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I want to get at is this: Is there any decision of any court showing that Mrs. Gaines is entitled to an acre beyond what Caleb Cushing got?

Mr. MULDROW. Yes; and the papers are here showing that. The only point before the court was as to the 10,000 arpents conveyed by Mrs. Gaines to Cushing. It did not involve the title to the remainder of the 50,000 arpents except as an incidental proposition.

Mr. CUTCHEON. What was conveyed to Caleb Cushing was a part of the 50,000 arpents?

Mr. MULDROW. Yes, sir; it is all included in substantially the same title.

Mr. COSGROVE. There is no question about it. Here is the decision.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I desire to hear it. Where is the decision reported?

Mr. COSGROVE. It is an abstract. There was a decision rendered by the district court of New Orleans.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Oh! it is a decision of a New Orleans court?

Mr. COSGROVE. And then the United States attorneys carried that decision by appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court unanimously confirmed the decision of the district court.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. In what reports is that decision?

Mr. MULDROW. It was never put in any of the reports. It is a manuscript opinion.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. What I can not understand is why that decision rendered so long ago by the Supreme Court was never printed in the United States Reports.

Mr. COSGROVE. The practice is that where the Supreme Court merely confirms a decision of the court below, and does not render an original decision, it is not put in the reports.

Mr. BLAND. I wish the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] to explain why this case is not also pursued in the courts as well as the case of Caleb Cushing.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will explain that to the gentleman.

Under the act of 1860 this claimant was enabled to present her claim and have her title confirmed in one of two ways: she could present her claim to Congress or to the courts. By the advice of her attorneys she chose to get her title confirmed by the process by which we are now seeking to confer it upon her. The result has been what you know. From Congress to Congress she has had every report in her favor except one; but the reports have not been acted on, and the remedy has never been granted.

Mr. BLAND. Has there been any explanation made why the one case went before the courts and the other before Congress?

Mr. COSGROVE. I will tell you. Mrs. Gaines conveyed a portion of the Urquhart grant, which is the only grant now in dispute. The title to the Lynd grant is conceded to be in her.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. And the Dugue grant is now abandoned.

Mr. COSGROVE. A portion of the Urquhart grant was conveyed by Mrs. Gaines to Mr. Cushing, and he obtained a judgment in his favor vesting the title to that portion of the grant in him. The court in passing upon that claim of Mr. Cushing said that it was clear——

Mr. BLAND. I understand that. What I wish to understand is why, if she gave this land to Mr. Cushing as a fee, he did not prosecute her claim to the whole amount of the grant.

Mr. COSGROVE. She conveyed this portion of the grant to him and he brought his suit to confirm his title to it.

Mr. BLAND. What did he do for the purpose of having her part of the grant confirmed?

Mr. COSGROVE. I can not tell.

Mr. BLAND. As I understand it, he got this land from her as his fee for acting as her attorney.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Perhaps Mr. Cushing found out that she was not entitled to any more of the grant, and he took all of it for his fee.

Mr. MULDROW. Ten thousand acres of the grant went to him as his fee, and the remaining part of the grant remained to Mrs. Gaines.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I desire the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] to answer this question: whether or not the Cushing grant and the land which is involved in this bill came to Mr. Clark, the father of the claimant, through the same deed or the same patent?

Mr. COSGROVE. It is included in the same deed.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It was part and parcel of it?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir. Thomas Urquhart had nine grants made to him by the Spanish intendant, Morales, for the following amounts: 3,000 arpents, 9,000, 940, 1,248, 602, 3,900, 10,263, 7,000, and 14,047; making a total of 50,000 arpents.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Then if Mrs. Gaines had not divided her holding and made a grant of a portion of it to Cushing it would have all gone up to the court on the same basis?

Mr. COSGROVE. Exactly. She had no greater title than that which she conveyed to Mr. Cushing, and she had no less. The old title from Urquhart to Mr. Clark, her father, is made in one deed which I have now before me. There is no question about the original grants; they are here in Spanish, and have been translated. The only objection made to them is that in the translation the translator used the word "acre" instead of "arpent."

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And an acre is more than an arpent.

Mr. COSGROVE. I want to say one other thing. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] intimated that this would be very valuable land scrip. I hold in my hand a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in which he approves of this bill. The bill confines the location of any land under the scrip issued in pursuance of this act if it shall pass to such lands as are offered for public sale and are worth only $1.25 an acre. That divests this scrip of the character which he seeks by implication to place upon it.

Now, after passing on this question the present Commissioner of the General Land Office says that had these facts which were then before him been laid before his predecessor undoubtedly the decision of his predecessor would have been in favor of this grant. The present Commissioner says:

> I do not consider that I have jurisdiction to now review, under the act of 1860, the action taken by my predecessor in this case, which was not prepared and presented here by the district land officers in the manner contemplated by that act. If Commissioner Drummond had been furnished with the original papers, certified copies, and other evidences which have been presented to Congress and the Congressional committees relative to these claims now under consideration, it is probable that the office report would have been favorable as to the validity of the grants.

Mark the language: not of the grant, but "of the grants." I desire to say that I have talked with Commissioner Drummond, who at the time made this adverse report, and he stated to me and to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] that he was now satisfied that Mrs. Gaines was entitled to this grant, and that had the evidence now before the House and the committee been before him he would have had no hesitation whatever in saying that she was entitled to this land.

It seems to me that the title of this lady to this land is as completely traceable by record evidence as any title can be traced. I was the chairman of the subcommittee to which this matter was referred. I examined it at my leisure and with care, and was able to see nothing in it that was not all straight. I never saw this lady in my life, and do not know that I ever will. I have come to the conclusion that this is a just claim; and whatever may be the merits of the claimant, she ought to have justice done her. If she is entitled to ten acres she ought to have it, and if to 10,000 or 50,000 acres she ought to have it.

Mr. LAIRD. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. COSGROVE. Certainly.

Mr. LAIRD. How was the issue presented at the time the title of Cushing was settled?

Mr. COSGROVE. It was presented by a petition which I have here. It states that "the petition of Caleb Cushing, a citizen of the State of Massachusetts, respectfully shows"—and then he goes on to show that this land was granted to Urquhart, was deeded by Urquhart to Clark——

Mr. LAIRD. Was his claim resisted?

Mr. COSGROVE. It was resisted by the district attorney of the United States and an appeal taken from the district court to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court affirmed the decision of the district court.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to refer to the report made to Congress by the commissioner appointed under the act of 1860, and to show how it happened that the grant to the extent of the conveyance to Cushing should have been confirmed without any reference to the question of title as to the balance.

I read from the report of the commissioner:

That part of this claim for 50,000 arpents for which an uncertified copy of an alleged Spanish patent is filed, namely, 10,262 arpents, appears as No. 18 in Cosby's Register C (American State Papers, D. Green's edition, volume 3, page 54). But with respect to the remainder of the 50,000 arpents claimed no report previous to that now under consideration appears to have been made.

In this case the claimant has not filed the sworn statement describing the supposed location of her claim, as provided by section 1 of the act of June 22, 1860.

A MEMBER. That was afterward supplied.

Mr. HOLMAN (continuing):

Neither is there any legal evidence in the case of the authenticity of the grant, figurative plans, or field-notes of survey upon which said claim is founded; nor is there any evidence whatever to show that Daniel Clark died seized of any part of said claim.

There has been no decision of the Supreme Court bearing on any part of these lands except the 10,202 acres, as to which this report of Mr. Cosby, the commissioner, leaves it a matter of at least fair inference that the claim was valid. To that extent the matter is left in somewhat indefinite terms; but as to the residue the positive statement is that there is no evidence to support the title. I trust, therefore, as a matter of common justice between this lady and the Government and our people who are interested in the land question, that at least the provision as to the 39,731 arpents will be stricken from the bill.

Now, as to the other branch of this claim, the claim to the 5,470 arpents, I wish to call the attention of my friend to the shadowy nature of the testimony in support of the title of the claimant.

In this case the claimant has not filed the sworn statement describing the supposed location of her claim, as required by section 1 of the act of June 22, 1860.

That is the Lynd claim. I concede that afterward a sworn statement was made.

Neither is there any legal evidence—

Now, here is an officer of this Government charged with a thorough investigation of this matter upon the ground, not at a remote point where testimony could not be readily procured. This commissioner representing the Government made investigation years ago upon the ground where these transactions are said to have occurred.

Neither is there any legal evidence of the authenticity of the grant to Lynd—

Gentlemen seem to content themselves with tracing the title from Lynd, who claimed under the Spanish grant; yet the question raised by this commissioner at the very outset was as to the validity of the grant to Lynd.

Neither is there any legal evidence of the authenticity of the grant to Lynd, except that found in the record of the court in the case of Lynd's heirs, and upon which the confirmation in their favor is founded; nor is there any evidence to show Daniel Clark's rights to any part of said land, except the sale to him in 1812 of 5,470 arpents; nor any evidence whatever to connect the alleged title of the present claimant with that of John Lynd or Daniel Clark.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the hurried manner in which we are compelled to investigate these subjects, guessing as we are obliged to do in reference to these old transactions of eighty years ago, it seems to me that in reference to these 5,470 arpents it would be safer to guess in behalf of the claimant than in behalf of the Government; for the presumptions are rather in her favor upon the basis of the statement in the report of the commissioner to which I have referred. In view, therefore, of the character of this statement, I shall move to strike out that part of this bill which undertakes to assert title to the balance of these 50,000 arpents, the claim to which, as shown by this report of an officer of the Government made years ago, in the absence of any motive so far as known to do injustice to this claimant, is absolutely without foundation.

Mr. SPRINGER. You concede the title of Mrs. Gaines to the 5,470 arpents?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think upon the strength of the statement in the report of this commissioner there may be some foundation for that claim.

The CHAIRMAN. General debate on this bill is now exhausted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I call for the reading of the bill by paragraphs for amendments under the five-minute rule.

The several sections of the bill were read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That patents shall issue in the usual manner to Myra Clark Gaines, her heirs and assigns, for all of the aforesaid lands which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find to be vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of by the United States, which patents shall operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not in any wise impair or preclude any adverse claimant or claimants from the right to assert the validity of their claim or claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That no mineral lands shall be granted by this act, or located by the scrip to be issued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. That for all of said lands which have been disposed of by the United States, or otherwise lawfully appropriated, the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall issue in lieu thereof certificates of location of the character prescribed by the sixth section of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes."

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives," shall apply to all the certificates of location which are issued under this act as aforesaid.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I observe that in the first section of this bill the lands involved are referred to as "the aforesaid lands," which are described in the preamble. I think therefore the preamble should be read, in order that the House may understand what lands are referred to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the preamble will be read.

The preamble was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and 5,470 arpents, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd, amounting altogether to 45,207 arpents, equal to 38,457 acres of land: Therefore.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to move an amendment to the preamble, which is made, very properly, I think, a part of the bill. I move to amend by striking out all after the word "entitled," in the second line, down to the word "five," in the fifth line. The words I propose to strike out are as follows:

To 39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman from Indiana concedes that in so far as the title to the lands in question was derived by the father of this claimant from Lynd, she is entitled to confirmation. But, sir, if there is any difference between these titles as to their absolute validity I can not discover it. The only difference is the difference of fact—that the claim derived from Urquhart embraces a greater number of acres; but there is no difference as to the validity of the titles. I have before me the title-papers in Spanish with English translations. The nine separate grants made by Morales, the Spanish intendant, to Thomas Urquhart, are set out in full in both languages.

Then in addition to that we have the deeds from Urquhart to Daniel Clark, father of Mrs. Gaines. The Supreme Court and the courts of the United States and the courts of Louisiana have decided not less than three or four times that this claimant is the only legal heir of the estate of Daniel Clark, deceased.

Mr. HOLMAN. The statement of Cosby was that there was no testimony showing that this claimant had any relationship to Clark. It is now shown she was Clark's daughter, and it is on that ground, that she is the daughter of Daniel Clark, her claim is allowed to the extent of 5,000 arpents. The presumption, then, is in her favor.

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes. He states that the presumption is that this lady is the legal heir and is entitled to whatever interest Daniel Clark had in these lands. Here are deeds showing as perfect a chain of title to this land as it is possible to see in any case.

Then, in regard to the expression used by the Commissioner that the affidavit required to be filed under the act of 1860 had not been done, and that in rejecting this claim he rejects it on the ground that the statutory requirements up to that time had not been complied with, I wish to say that an act was subsequently passed extending the time in which this testimony could be filed, and during that period, which extended the provisions of the act of 1860, Mrs. Gaines filed with the proper officer of the Government the affidavits which were required by that act, and thus supplied the defect in the papers cited by the gentleman from Indiana, thereby wiping out in this case whatever there was of want of proof.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. COSGROVE. I can only yield for a question, and not for an argument.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to ask a question.

Mr. COSGRVOE. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. How do you explain, then, the fact that this lady came to Congress if she had a claim which could be sustained elsewhere?

Mr. COSGROVE. I endeavored to answer that question before, but will now answer it again, so the committee may understand it. She was advised by her attorney that under the construction he placed on the act of 1860 it was a more speedy and direct remedy to come to Congress than to go into the courts. Her grantee, Caleb Cushing, took the other course, and the Congress of the United States confirmed his title. It was due only to a mistake of her attorney in advising her, as it now proves to have been, that she pursued the wrong remedy.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is to say, she did not act on the advice her attorney gave her.

Mr. COSGROVE. Caleb Cushing was not her attorney, and did not give her that advice.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. LAIRD. I will take the floor, Mr. Chairman, and yield my time to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to read what the Commissioner of the General Land Office, Mr. McFarland, said in regard to this bill, for I understand the gentleman from Mississippi who was a member of the Land Committee, and, if I recollect truly, chairman of that committee at one time——

Mr. MULDROW. I was a member of it.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman from Mississippi addressed to the Commissioner of the General Land Office a letter in which he invites the opinion of the Commissioner on the pending measure. To that letter the Commissioner of the General Land Office replied, taking some exception to the bill which had been introduced, suggesting amendments to it. This bill now before this committee is the one approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and in passing on that question he says this—I read from his letter dated January 31, 1882:

If Commissioner Drummond had been furnished with the original papers, certified copies, and other evidence which has been presented to courts and Congressional committees relative to the three claims now under consideration, it is probable the office report would have been favorable as to the validity of the grants. It appears from examination that two of the grants and a portion of another, under which Mrs. Gaines now applies for relief, have been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, which settled the title in the original grantees from Spain.

That is what he says, and that report referred to here is the very report read at the Clerk's desk as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. Since that report was made this evidence, then wanting and necessary in order to establish the validity of this title, has been funished and filed with the proper office in conformity with the act of Congress.

I will read an extract from the proceedings in the case of The United States vs. Caleb Cushing:

And the petitioner now begs leave to specify the lands which are sold by the said Morales to the said Urquhart and Andry & Pollock, and which are embraced in this claim, and to show their present condition: First, of the 50,000 arpents sold by the said intendant, Morales, to said Thomas Urquhart on the 29th of November, 1803, there is included in said conveyance by the said Myra Clark Gaines to the petitioner a tract of 10,263 arpents.

The title of Urquhart was before the court because Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines made a deed to Cushing and of course she could have had no greater title than her father, and the father could have had no title except what he derived from Urquhart. And the court passed upon that question inferentially if not directly; because if the whole of the grant was not valid then certainly a part of it could not have been valid, because they were made identically under the same forms of law. Now, the deed from the Spanish Government shows that Urquhart paid the money into the Spanish treasury on account of the grant. The deed itself expresses the consideration, says that it was sufficient, that the coin was paid into the treasury of the Spanish Government, naming the amount, and there is therefore as good a chain of title in connection with this property as can possibly be made with reference to any piece of property in this country.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard only for a few moments with reference to the subject-matter now under discussion. I shall occupy the time of the committee but very briefly.

Myra Clark Gaines is a name which has become historic in this country. We know that the grant of land purchased by Jefferson from the great Napoleon—Louisiana—was once owned by the Government of Spain. The preamble of this bill declares a fact which I suppose no gentleman on this floor would undertake to question, that Thomas Urquhart, while Spain owned that great eminent domain, purchased a large tract of land which was subsequently sold by him to Daniel Clark, the father of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines.

For fifty-four years of her life that indefatigable little woman has been petitioning, pleading, fighting for her rights through the channels of the courts and has finally come to Congress for its action. Her right has been also declared to a part of this land by the Supreme Court; and now this grant of land which was purchased by Urquhart from Spain, and which under our treaties was to be recognized as valid, has been taken by the Government, and at this late day this committee report, on an examination of the whole subject, that Myra Clark Gaines may have the lands yet undisposed of, and other lands in lieu of lands which the Government has sold, but which rightfully belonged to her. That is to say, she is to have lands in lieu of the lands which were sold to Urquhart by the Spanish Government, and which he paid for, but which this Government occupied. It provides that she may have in land scrip an equal amount of acres, and this bill proposes at this late day to do her only justice.

Mr. Chairman, it is the supreme concern of the great government of the universe that justice may be done to all, and I hope that this bill which has been carefully considered in the committee, and which my honored friend on my right [Mr. ROBINSON, of New York] presented to this House, may pass and that we may ring down the curtain, feeling that justice has been done to this little woman after fifty-four years of as gallant a fight as was ever made in this world by one single individual. I hope, sir, that the American Congress will vote this bill through at once, and do justice to this good woman in her old age. She is now 79 years old, and I hope that rectitude which ought to distinguish all the acts of this Government may be exhibited in the votes of members in support of this measure.

Mr. BELFORD. Mr. Chairman, I propose now to support this bill, although my first impression was against it. From my earliest infancy I have heard of Mrs. Myra Clark Gaines, the lady who has been strugling and battling in the courts of this country to secure her legal rights to her father's property. I have heard to-day some of the most extraordinary legal arguments that have ever been submitted to any body of men on the face of this earth; and in my judgment there is no lawyer here who has sense enough to fill out a blank subpœna who would sign his name to those arguments, and will not appear in the RECORD upon the basis that he now stands upon. I venture that assertion and I do not believe that it will be contradicted.

What is the question here presented? Here is a land grant made by the Spanish Government to a Mr. Urquhart before that portion of our territory had been acquired from Spain. That grant was made to the father of Mrs. Gaines. She has a derivative claim from him. Subsequently she made a grant of 10,000 acres, a part of this same claim, to Mr. Caleb Cushing, who, in order to establish his title to the grant, brought a suit, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and I am advised by the gentleman from Missouri that that court, after a full investigation of the question, affirmed his title to the land. Now, on what did the title of Mr. Cushing rest, except on the title that Mrs. Gaines had acquired from her father? It could rest on nothing else. It must stand or fall with that.

But notwithstanding all of those circumstances, gentlemen are willing to rise here and claim that she had no valid right. Instead, however, of standing year after year in the courts of this country in costly litigation to sustain her title, she comes to the Congress of the United States and asks, as she has a perfect right to ask, this body to confirm her title. Old and wearied, tired, and practically worn out with half a century of litigation, have not we got the gallantry and the manhood and the dignity to confirm her claim! I believe we have. That is all I wish to say, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to strike out the last word.

I make this formal motion, Mr. Chairman, simply for the purpose of saying that it is not very often that my mind is changed by one of these debates in the House. But I confess that in this case I came to the consideration of this claim prejudiced against it, and thought after what I had heard from the gentleman from Illinois when this question was presented, one week ago from to-day, that when it came before the House I should be compelled to vote against it.

But after hearing the explanations of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COSGROVE] I do not see that as honest men we can do anything else than to give this woman her rights. If the statements made by the gentlemen who have reported this bill are to be relied upon—and of that I make no question—she is certainly entitled to this land or to the substitute which this bill provides.

Let us look at it a moment. There is no question but she is the heir of General Clark. If he had title she has title. There is no doubt General Clark was the grantee of Urquhart. If Urquhart had title General Clark had title. There is no doubt Urquhart had a grant from the Spanish Government, and if the Spanish Government had title then Urquhart had title; and there is no question made here but that the Spanish Government had title to this land. The chain, then, is complete from the Spanish Government to this claimant. I can not see how we can get away from it. We sit here as a court. We were told by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] that two modes of obtaining redress were provided: one through the courts, which Caleb Cushing pursued; one through commissioners and Congress, which Mrs. Gaines has pursued by advice of her counsel. We are sitting here as a court, and are bound by our judicial oath to do justice to this woman. And I do not see how as a matter of honesty and good faith we can fail to vote for this bill. I did not think a week ago that I should reach this conclusion; but with all the facts before me I can not do otherwise than vote for the bill, and I have offered this formal amendment for the purpose of saying so.

Mr. BRUMM. As I understand this bill proposes to restore title so far as the Government is able to lands which are considered by the Committee on Private Land Claims to belong to Mrs. Gaines; and as to the lands which the Government can not restore it is to issue scrip to Mrs. Gaines or her heirs for lands to be located wherever she pleases.

Now if my understanding of the character of the bill is correct, then I shall say, so far as the first proposition is concerned, if that constituted the whole bill with a different proviso substituted for the second proposition I would vote for it. That is, if the Government has deprived this woman of the title to any lands that belong to her the Government ought to return to her the title to those lands. If there are other lands the Government can not return to her, then it is indebted to her for the amount of the value of those lands; and the Government ought to pay its honest debt and pay this woman, as it pays every other creditor of the Government, in dollars and cents.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to granting land-scrip for one acre more except for homestead purposes and the right of way for railways. If we have had experience of any measure that has recoiled upon the action of this Government, that has been evil in its tendency, it is the issue of land-scrip and allowing the holders to watch their chances and pounce upon every acre of land just as the lands are being developed and thus obtain the advantage of bona fide and honest purchasers.

This is not the only bill of the kind before the House. There are bills here involving the taking up of thousands and thousands of acres of land. I say this Government ought to pay its honest debt, and pay it in dollars and cents. This is simply carrying out a policy that was inaugurated here years ago, and against which there is a cry coming up from every section of the country. It is a policy that means practically the entailing of our lands and robbing our posterity of them. We have already robbed posterity of thousands and millions of acres too much. And the evil is growing. I for one can not see how my friend before me [Mr. ROBINSON, of New York] can consistently vote for such a bill; a man who stands here as an advocate of free lands for free homes; a man who stands here—and I know he is honest in it—against the robbery of lands. I am surprised that he should vote for such a proposition simply because the Government owes this woman. Whether it does or not, and the question is a doubtful one——

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to say a word?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I renew the pro forma amendment.

I say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] that I am in favor of limiting the robbery of this land from the people. I go as far as he can go and I am as honest as he can be in opposition to that, and particularly on the part of foreign nobles and wealthy men, who come here and monopolize the land which belongs to the people. But while I am opposed to that sort of robbery I am opposed also to the robbery which is proposed to be done here by that gentleman and others who oppose this bill. When I am opposing robbery I oppose particularly the robbery of a venerable and worthy woman in her seventy-ninth year. If I will rob any one I will rob a man or a foreigner or the Government before I will rob her.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the bill, with amendments, be laid aside to be reported to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment to the preamble proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to extend my amendment further by striking out the three last lines of the preamble. I ask that the whole amendment as now modified may be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 3, 4, and 5, the following: "39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and;" and strike out all of lines 7, 8, and 9; so that as amended it will read:

"Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 5,470 arpents, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd: Therefore.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask a question of the gentleman who has this bill in charge. I desire to know if the scrip proposed to be issued by this act may be located on the unoffered lands of the United States?

Mr. COSGROVE. It can not be.

Mr. HEPBURN. On the unsurveyed lands of the United States?

Mr. COSGROVE. No, sir; only upon offered lands at a price not exceeding $1.25 an acre.

Mr. MULDROW. The bill in its third section refers to and makes part of the bill the provisions of the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land-scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives." One of the provisions of that act is: "That said entry be made only on lands subject to private entry at $1.25 per acre."

The question was taken upon the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN; and upon a division there were—ayes 18, noes 61.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe no quorum has voted.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COSGROVE and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 34, noes 83.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum has yet voted, and the tellers will continue their count. Gentlemen are requested to vote, so that the committee may not find itself without a quorum.

The tellers continued the count, and reported that there were—ayes 38, noes 95.

Mr. HOLMAN (one of the tellers). That is not a quorum, I believe.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum has voted, and the Chair will direct the roll to be called.

Mr. MULDROW. I hope that will not be done. There are members here who have not voted.

Mr. BELFORD. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BELFORD. I desire to inquire whether the party which has seventy majority on the floor of this House can not furnish enough members, with the aid of the Republican party, to make a quorum? [After a brief pause.] I will withdraw that inquiry. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will continue the count, and gentlemen are requested to vote to make a quorum.

Mr. HOLMAN (one of the tellers). With the understanding that the text of the bill is still subject to amendment, I will not insist upon a further count.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the text of the bill has been passed by the committee, and it requires unanimous consent to amend it now.

Mr. COSGROVE (one of the tellers). I would rather go through with the count now than to go over the whole matter again.

The tellers continued their count, and reported that there were—ayes 55, noes 110.

So the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN was not agreed to.

Mr. BLAND. Is it in order to move an amendment to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BLAND. Can I offer a substitute for the bill?

Mr. MULDROW. I make the point of order that the time has passed when a substitute can be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will consider the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call attention to the fact that the preamble of this bill is really a part of the text of the first section; that is, the text of the first section would be absolutely meaningless without the preamble. The preamble is referred to in the text of the bill and made a part of the text. If you leave out the preamble the bill would not mean anything. Having perfected the bill, this is the only time in which a substitute for the whole bill can be voted upon. Therefore it is in order after the text of the bill has been perfected to vote upon a substitute for the entire bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to rule, and does rule, that a substitute for the bill and the preamble would be in order.

Mr. BELFORD. Is not that practically an amendment to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. A substitute for the whole bill, including the preamble, would be in order.

Mr. BLAND. I offer this substitute which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears that Myra Clark Gaines, as the legal representative of Daniel Clark, deceased, of Louisiana, is entitled to 39,737 arpents of land, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to Thomas Urquhart, and 5,470 arpents, being a portion of a grant made by Spain to John Lynd, amounting altogether to 45,207 arpents, equal to 38,457 acres of land: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That patents shall issue in the usual manner to Myra Clark Gaines, her heirs and assigns, for all of the aforesaid lands which the Commissioner of the General Land Office shall find to be vacant, unappropriated, and undisposed of by the United States, which patent shall operate only as a relinquishment of title on the part of the United States, and shall not in any wise impair or preclude any adverse claimant or claimants from the right to assert the validity of their claim or claims in a court or courts of justice: Provided, That no mineral lands shall be granted by this act or located by the scrip to be issued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. That for all of said lands which have been disposed of by the United States, or otherwise lawfully appropriated, there shall be paid to the claimant the sum of $1.25 per acre out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the substitute for the preamble and the bill.

Mr. BLAND. I offer that substitute so that if the bill passes money shall be paid instead of land.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is right.

Mr. COSGROVE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman vote for this bill if the substitute shall be adopted?

Mr. BLAND. The crying evil in this country is the monopoly of the public lands. If we are to remain a free people, it must be by encouraging individual settlement and ownership of the soil of this country. Any measure that looks to a monopoly of the land of this country ought no longer to receive the sanction of this House or of this Congress.

We had better pay this lady $5 an acre for this land than to give her an opportunity to monopolize a single acre of the public land. It is claimed, I believe, by the friends of this bill that this scrip will be worth only $1.25 an acre. Therefore whatever land this lady may be entitled to she will lose nothing by the adoption of this substitute, while the people of the country would gain everything when they gained their rights to the public lands of the country for homestead settlement by private citizens.

We have gone too far, sir, in granting land-scrip, in giving portions of our public domain for railroads or other public improvements, in squandering the public lands for all sorts of purposes and on all occasions, until the people of this country are beginning to believe that Congress, in its lavish disposition of the public domain, will deprive them of all opportunity for further settlements by homestead entry. Indeed, sir, it is even now almost impossible for a man to pre-empt a piece of land for a homestead. He must search through the whole domain of this Government in order to find one hundred and sixty acres suitable for cultivation and not already monopolized by some railroad company or some land speculator under these grants of land-scrip, &c., by Congress.

Unless the substitute which I now offer be adopted, I hope the House will vote down this bill, as it should vote down every bill that looks to allowing speculators to monopolize the public domain. If this lady is entitled to anything give her the money.

Mr. MULDROW. If the bill be amended so as to give her the money will the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, that is not the proposition. I am not ready to say that I shall vote for the bill under any circumstances. I think this question is one which ought to have received the attention of the courts; it might properly have been referred to the Court of Claims. But certainly I will not vote for this or any other bill which looks to issuing land-scrip to any individual in such a way that the public domain may be speculated upon and monopolized.

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Chairman, the committee in this case has simply pursued the law of 1860, under which this woman has brought her claim before Congress. The law directed the manner in which she should proceed, and that mode has been pursued. The law also provides what shall be the remedy where the Government has disposed of any portion of the land in question. It provides in such cases for the issuance of scrip, as proposed in this bill. This scip, when issued, is to be located on lands not exceeding in value $1.25 per acre. I hope, therefore, that the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] will be voted down.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] whether there is any portion of the original land which may be patented under the bill.

Mr. MULDROW. I understand there is some, but as to the precise quantity I am not able to answer.

Mr. SPRINGER. Where is the land located?

Mr. MULDROW. In the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman know what that land is worth?

Mr. MULDROW. I do not. But I know that parties who bought it from the Government paid not less than $1.25 per acre for it, or they would not have obtained it.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the Government has sold the land to other parties, then of course the original land can not go to the claimant in this case.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Nobody expects that.

Mr. MULDROW. It is evident that the land must have been worth at least $1.25 an acre, because otherwise it would not have been disposed of by the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I want to know whether under this bill any of the original land covered by these grants will go to the claimant?

Mr. PETTIBONE. Yes; all that has not been sold by the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much of the original land has not been sold by the General Government?

Mr. MULDROW. I can not answer that question, but only a small part; the bulk of it has been sold.

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems to me the Committee on Private Land Claims should have furnished the House with information which would have enabled us to adjudicate this case correctly. It is possible, I understand, that some of the identical land may be recovered by the claimant under this bill. On the other hand, if none can be recovered, she is to be paid in scrip. It is very material as to the merits of this case to know whether the claimant is to get the original land covered by the grants from Spain, or whether she will receive scrip, which may go into the hands of speculators to be located upon choice bits of the public domain, large portions of which have already been taken up by corporations or others who have gone out there to gather in all that is good of the public lands.

Mr. MULDROW. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], I desire to say it is impossible under the bill that this scrip should be issued for other lands than such as have been heretofore offered by the Government for entry at $1.25 per acre. This scrip can not possibly be located upon any unoffered lands of the Government. The provision made in this bill for this claimant is the very least which could be made in any event for any claimant having a just demand of this nature against the Government.

Mr. BRUMM. Is the gentleman opposed to the substitute?

Mr. MULDROW. I am opposed to the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move pro forma to amend by striking out the last word. Before we vote on this proposition, which involves an expenditure of a sufficient quantity of lands of the United States to make homes for four hundred settlers, I think gentlemen should be reminded of some of the pledges they have made as to the disposition of the public lands.

It is assumed by the friends of this measure that the Government of the United States is indebted to the beneficiary in this bill in a sum equal to about $45,000. Instead of paying this sum in money, they propose to appropriate as payment 38,000 acres of land belonging to the public domain. Remember this is to be done as payment of a debt. There is no reason why payment should be made in this particular manner except, as some gentleman has said, that it is in the line of precedent.

If it is in the line of precedent, I suggest it is a most unwise one, and that the following of that precedent is in direct face of a pledge which has been made by every one of the political parties of this country. The Democratic national convention in its last session used this language in respect to the public domain:

> The public credit and the public money for public purposes solely, and the public lands for the actual settlers.

That was Democratic doctrine four years ago, that the public domain should be preserved for the actual settler; that that was the only use to which it should be put, and that it should not be used in the payment of claims against the United States.

The Greenback party in its national convention said in the fifth plank of its platform:

> And henceforth the public domain is to be reserved exclusively as homes for actual settlers.

The Republican party over and over again has indulged at various conventions in substantially the same declaration.

Now we propose to go back on all these pledges and use the public land as a medium for the payment of ordinary debts, and that, too, in the face of the fact there is abundance of money in the Treasury to meet all its demands.

Mr. Chairman, there are to-day being hawked about the streets of Washington varieties of scrip, some I think worth $100 an acre. I have not had an opportunity to examine how far provision of law would limit the value of these lands, but I am fully persuaded there must be some job, there must be some extraordinary and unusual advantage, that there must be something covered up here, or else this claimant would be glad to have the money rather than the land. I have no doubt, sir, it will ultimately be found by some construction this scrip can be used for the purpose of taking up lands when the actual settler can not get them or at a time he can not get hold of them.

There is land-scrip now used for the purpose of locating them on grants heretofore made to railroad companies now in process of resumption. In one instance they have been located on a town of 1,800 inhabitants, in another of 1,200 inhabitants, and in another instance upon a grave-yard near a town. The lands can be located through this means where the lands have not been offered for sale, and in some instances without the lands having been surveyed. A great advantage is given to the holder of them.

While I am not prepared to say with positiveness those contemplated under this act are of this class, yet I am not prepared to say they are not, and therefore I am unwilling to vote for this proposition. I am certainly unwilling to vote for it in the face of the pledges my party has made, and I think other gentlemen on this floor should have like hesitation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COSGROVE. I wish to say to the gentleman from Iowa that the bill was drawn specially to guard against the issuance of scrip of the character to which he has referred.

Mr. HEPBURN. It does under the act of 1860, but does it under the other act of 1879?

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand it does.

Mr. HEPBURN. I understand it does not.

Mr. COSGROVE. The Department having it in charge construes it differently from the gentleman.

So far as the gentleman may think there is something behind this, I can only say it expresses exactly all that it is intended to mean. Early at this session of Congress the matter was referred to me, and I have sought diligently by every means in my power to ascertain all the facts, and I undertake to say, so far as I know, if there ever was a claim presented to this or any other Congress divested of anything that looks like a job it is this.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not mean to question the indebtedness, but I am quarreling with the manner of paying it. Why do you wish to go outside of the ordinary rule of payment? Why not pay it in greenbacks? Why not pay it in legal-tenders or in standard silver dollars? Why not pay it in the ordinary way payments are made?

Mr. COSGROVE. I yielded to the gentleman for a question and not a speech. Now, if I thought my colleague [Mr. BLAND] offered his substitute in good faith I would vote for it.

Mr. BLAND. I will say I did offer it in good faith.

Mr. COSGROVE. I asked you whether you would support the bill if the substitute were adopted, and you declined to answer.

Mr. BLAND. I will support the substitute; but whether I will support the bill is another question. If the case is a good one it should be passed in such a way as to preserve the public lands.

Mr. COSGROVE. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that this lady would herself infinitely prefer to have the money, if Congress will vote it to her, rather than this scrip which the bill proposes.

Mr. BRUMM. Then let me ask the gentleman why not accept the substitute?

Mr. COSGROVE. For the simple reason that I am not authorized to do so by the committee. I am acting under the directions of the committee which reported this bill, and that is the reason. I am not acting in an individual capacity, but simply as the representative of the committee.

Now, I presume as an individual, and I will take the liberty of saying it here, that if I had the right to speak for myself alone I should be willing to accept the substitute, because I would infinitely prefer it to the original bill.

But to the question raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] I wish to say that this bill is simply in accordance with the custom and the practice of Congress in similar cases; that is, to issue land-scrip when the Government has taken possession of property belonging to others under such circumstances; and the bill does not make a wholesale transfer of the public domain, as the gentleman has stated. It makes no change whatever of the laws in that respect. It has no reference to a wholesale grant of the public domain to railroad corporations or others. It is a nice thing to come in here and undertake to connect a claim of this character with the grants of public lands heretofore made to railroad corporations, when it has no relevancy whatever to it. It has no more connection with the grants to such corporations than it would have to a land grant in the moon.

Again, I will say to the gentleman that this scrip is issued not in one single certificate, but in a variety of certificates, and they can be transferred to persons who wish to become actual settlers on the public domain. It serves exactly the same purposes in that respect, so far as settlers are concerned, as all other scrip issued by the Government serves. And this talk that we are about at one fell swoop to wipe out the public domain in the payment of a debt of thirty or forty thousand dollars is all sound but no substance. It has no foundation to stand upon. If the bill passes the certificates provided for will be issued in accordance with the Congressional subdivisions of the public domain, and I presume will be transferred or offered for sale and sold if possible in the market.

Mr. HEPBURN. Let me ask the gentleman if he voted for the Holman resolution?

Mr. COSGROVE. The Holman resolution? I did, sir.

Mr. HEPBURN. You did? Well, did not that provide that the lands of the United States should be reserved expressly for the homesteaders?

Mr. COSGROVE. I will answer the gentleman by saying that this bill does exactly that and nothing else. It reserves these lands for actual settlers. That is the very thing that I have been trying to state to the gentleman from Iowa. It does that, and it is strictly in accordance with the spirit of the resolution proposed by my friend from Indiana, which I supported then and support now.

Mr. HEPBURN. But this bill requires the settlers, if they purchase the scrip, to pay at least $1.25 per acre on taking the lands for settlement. It therefore reserves that much of the public domain from homestead settlement, which could be made without the payment of this $1.25 an acre.

Mr. COSGROVE. I understand that; but I also understand that there are a great many lands entered in this country and are paid for by the acre which are not entered by homesteaders. There are more lands entered at the purchase price than are taken by homestead entry.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the gentleman from Missouri a question?

Mr. COSGROVE. With pleasure.

Mr. EATON. Did the committee find that so many thousand acres of land had been taken by the United States from the petitioner as claimant?

Mr. COSGROVE. In substance they did.

Mr. EATON. Did they find that the value of the lands so taken was $1.25 an acre?

Mr. COSGROVE. Some was worth that, some more.

Mr. EATON. Very well; then it may be assumed that the lands are worth $1.25 an acre?

Mr. COSGROVE. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. Then I propose to vote for the substitute; and I can answer the question which I understand the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was supposed to have declined to answer: that I would rather, if the Government of the United States owes this lady this claim, pay her $40,000 or $50,000 than to give her the land. If, then, this is a just claim, let us give her the money.

Mr. MULDROW. Will the gentleman from Connecticut permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. MULDROW. I will say to the gentleman that this lady pursued her remedy under the methods provided by prior acts of Congress. The act of 1860, under which she pursued her remedy, provides just how her payment shall be made in the event the lands had been disposed of by the Government.

Mr. EATON. It provides that she must be paid in other lands?

Mr. MULDROW. Yes, sir; and unless Congress goes back on its promises she must be paid in that manner. This bill is therefore made to conform to the act of 1860; and the committee regarded that as the only remedy that this lady had, as it provides that she shall be paid by the Government in scrip to the same extent that her lands had been disposed of by the Government. That is all the bill proposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to strike out the last word.

It appears to this committee now that Mrs. Gaines is the owner, lawful and equitable, of this entire parcel of land, but that as regards a portion of it the United States has taken it, appropriated it, and sold it, and that it has now passed beyond the control of the Government. It is proposed by this bill to recompense Mrs. Gaines for that which the United States has taken and appropriated, and the sole question is, how shall we do it? By a previous statute it is provided that it shall be done in scrip. This bill simply pursues the course marked out by the previous law. But it is competent for this Congress now to make a new law governing this case.

I agree entirely with the gentleman from Missouri on my left [Mr. BLAND] in regard to the public policy that should govern the disposition of the public domain. And it seems to me that if we can reduce this to dollars and cents it will be a wiser policy than it will be to grant this scrip that may be laid on the public domain anywhere, we do not know where. I therefore, for one, shall support the substitute which has been offered, because I believe it embodies what is the wiser public policy and the safer one for us to pursue.

Mr. BLAND. I want to state to my colleague [Mr. COSGROVE] that this amendment was offered in good faith; and I want to state further that, so far as I am concerned, I have given no intimation that there was any job connected with this bill, and I am sure there will be no job connected with it if my colleague knows it, for he is not one of those who deal in jobs; he is not a jobber.

That the bill is reported in conformity to past statutes is conceded. It is also in conformity to the past practice of Congress in granting lands in lieu of those the Government has disposed of. That also I admit. But what I object to is proceeding further with this sort of policy. I consider that it is better to pay money for lands the Government has sold than to issue scrip for lands which may be bought up by speculators so that the lands of the Government will be monopolized.

Therefore I have offered this substitute. The question whether I shall vote for the bill if the substitute is adopted has nothing to do with the merits of the case. I do not say I shall vote against the bill. So far as I have heard the case there are some merits in it. How far those merits go I am not able to determine just at this time. But I am sure the bill will have greater strength if the substitute is adopted than if it remains in its present shape.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. BRUMM. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, under this bill the whole amount of lands that could possibly be given to the beneficiary would be equal to 38,457 acres. And this land, so much as may still be in the possession of the Government or that the Government will be able to restore under the bill and under the substitute, will be restored by patents to the beneficiary. As to the balance the substitute provides that she shall receive—what? Why, that she shall receive the amount of the maximum value of the land-scrip that you propose to give under the original bill. The only objection that the gentlemen have to this rests on the fact that the committee has set its eye upon one point, and because they have said so we ought not to go back on anything they have done. There is no question as to the merits of the proposition. There can be none, for we offer you by this substitute the amount of the maximum value. It is not an estimate even. We give you the whole maximum value of every acre, and yet you are not satisfied with that.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the whole amount may only be a few thousand dollars. For aught we know the Government may get back a great deal, perhaps 50 or more per cent. of the whole; and you will have only to give the money for the balance.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] has read the platform of the Democratic party as bearing upon this proposition and has referred to the Holman resolution. I want to remind my Republican friends of the fact that the Republican party came into existence when Abraham Lincoln was elected, with this great slogan: "Lincoln and free homesteads." You owe your very existence to the principle involved in this bill. I do not care as to the practice of Congress. It is the principle involved that is all-important; and I say both sides of this House are solemnly committed to not granting any more land-scrip to the amount of a single acre, except for homesteads.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 566) for the relief of Z. M. Pettigrew;

A bill (S. 938) confirming to W. S. Byers & Co. the right to take and use water from the Umatilla River, on the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, for manufacturing purposes;

A bill (S. 1482) for the relief of William H. Randle, of Nashville, Tenn.;

A bill (S. 1518) to authorize the Secretary of War to furnish certificates of discharge to certain members of the Missouri Home Guards;

A bill (S. 1596) for the relief of the heirs of Martin Kenofsky; and

A bill (S. 2093) to provide for the appointment of an acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I move to amend section 2 of the substitute by striking out all after the word "appropriated," in the second line of that section, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

The number of acres so disposed of shall be ascertained by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and by him certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized and required to pay to said Myra Clark Gaines a sum of money equivalent to $1.25 an acre for said lands so disposed of and so ascertained; and there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated a sum sufficient to pay the same.

Mr. BLAND. I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question will be on the substitute as modified.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to amend by adding to the substitute the following:

Provided, That the whole amount appropriated under this bill shall not exceed the sum of $8,000.

Mr. PETERS. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether, if the substitute as modified shall be adopted, scrip will be paid to the claimant for the amount that has not been appropriated by or disposed of by the United States?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not answer that question; it is argumentation.

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposed substitute cuts out all scrip; there will be no scrip under the proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the substitute as modified.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to speak to that amendment. If adopted my amendment will allow $2 an acre for 4,000 acres of land, which is in round numbers about the number of acres that is covered by the undisputed part of this claim. I have therefore placed the whole amount to be paid under this bill at $8,000, and I think that is ample.

I believe that when Caleb Cushing filed his claim in the court, the decision of which was affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, he intended to embrace and did embrace in that claim all of the grant known as the Urquhart grant. That amount of the claim was then recognized as valid and affirmed by the Supreme Court. That is all there is of that claim. It was adjudicated and nothing of it left for any future claim. The very wording of Caleb Cushing's petition shows that he was not claiming a portion of that grant but all of it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have read the petition over very carefully and understand it in that way.

Mr. COSGROVE. He says directly to the reverse.

Mr. SPRINGER. I know that is claimed by some, but a careful reading of the petition will bear out the statement I have made. Now, here is a Committee of the Whole House adjudicating a claim worth $40,000, conceding all that is said in support of it, when material facts are disputed on this floor. For this reason, if for no other, I am unprepared to vote for the disputed part of this claim, but will vote for a liberal amount of money to pay the undisputed part of it.

One thing further. I am opposed to paying any part of the debts of the United States in scrip to be located on the public lands. The United States as a country is not a pauper that it must set aside now and then a portion of its assets to pay its just debts. The public domain, through the platforms of all the political parties and by the solemn pledges of this House, is to be reserved for actual settlers, and not to be doled out in scrip to pay the debts of the United States.

If the Government of the United States owes anything it is amply able to pay every cent of it. This Government is not a pauper. It has over $400,000,000 in its Treasury now. Its Treasury is groaning under the weight of the silver dollars and the gold dollars that are lying in its vaults. Yet it is here proposed to pay what you call an honest claim by scrip to be located on the public lands. I am opposed to paying any of the debts of the Government of the United States in that way.

Mr. RANDALL. With the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] I desire to submit a motion that the committee rise in order that I may submit to the House a conference report on the deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. COSGROVE. I desire the floor when the Committee of the Whole shall again resume the consideration of the pending bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was then agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I now submit a conference report, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 6073) "to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 4, 5, 7, and 13, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "15,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by said Senate amendment insert the following:

"That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to settle and allow, if found correct, the accounts of the disbursing clerks of the Interior Department for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884 for disbursements made on account of support of the Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum by transfer of any unexpended balance, and apply the same to purposes for which the subdivisions of the appropriations for said institution for the years above mentioned are exhausted; and the payments made to clerks, watchmen, laborers, laundresses, and teamsters of said hospital for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884 may be allowed and chargeable to the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses for said fiscal years, respectively. But the aggregate amounts appropriated for the expenses of the hospital and asylum for the above fiscal years shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized. The amount of said transfers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, shall not exceed $1,000."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Restore the matter proposed to be stricken out by said amendment, and add at the end thereof the following: "Except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property;" and the Senate agree to the same.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
JAMES N. BURNES,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.
W. B. ALLISON,
EUGENE HALE,
JAMES B. BECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the explanatory statement of the House conferees, which under the rules accompanies this report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill making appropriations to supply certain urgent deficiencies for the fiscal year 1884, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the action recommended on each amendment in the accompanying conference report, namely:

On amendment No. 1: Appropriates $128,000 for fuel, lights, and water for public buildings.

On amendment No. 4: Strikes out the sum of $16,000 proposed for heating, hoisting, and ventilating apparatus.

On amendment No. 5: Appropriates $5,393.18 for stationery for use in wrapping and mailing the reports of the Tenth Census.

On amendment No. 6: Appropriates $15,000 for incidental expenses of land offices.

On amendments numbered 7 and 8: In lieu of the language stricken out and that proposed to be inserted the following is recommended as a substitute, namely:

"That the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized to settle and allow, if found correct, the accounts of the disbursing clerks of the Interior Department for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884 for disbursements made on account of support of Freedmen's Hospital and Asylum by transfer of any unexpended balance, and apply the same to purposes for which the subdivisions of the appropriations for said institution for the years above mentioned are exhausted. And the payments made to clerks, watchmen, laborers, laundresses, and teamsters of said hospital for the fiscal years 1882, 1883, and 1884 may be allowed and chargeable to the appropriation for clothing, bedding, forage, transportation, and miscellaneous expenses for said fiscal years, respectively; but the aggregate amounts appropriated for the expenses of the hospital and asylum for the above years shall not be exceeded because of the transfer herein authorized. The amount of said transfers for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, shall not exceed $1,000."

On amendment No. 12: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out inserts the following: "And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property."

The bill as agreed to appropriates in all $1,671,579.87.

SAM. J. RANDALL,
JAMES N. BURNES,
W. H. CALKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I am now ready to answer any inquiry which any member may wish to make in reference to this report. In the absence of any such inquiry I will state that the disagreement between the Senate and the House as to the amounts of expenditure involved in this bill were in the main quickly settled. The real point in controversy was upon the twelfth amendment of the Senate, which proposed to strike out the following provision in the bill as passed by the House:

And hereafter no Department or officer of the United States shall accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law.

This provision was inserted by the House because, under a practice which has grown up, clerks in the Departments here and perhaps Government employés elsewhere, having been employed, as it may be said, after hours, have demanded additional compensation for service thus rendered. The House conferees hold that cases of this kind ought to have been reached by existing law as contained in the following provision of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act approved March 3, 1883:

That hereafter it shall be the duty of the heads of the several Executive Departments, in the interest of the public service, to require of all clerks and other employés, of whatever grade or class, in their respective Departments not less than seven hours of labor each day, except Sundays and days declared public holidays by law or executive order: Provided, That the heads of the Departments may by special order, stating the reason, further extend or limit the hours of service of any clerk or employé in their Departments respectively, but in case of an extension it shall be without additional compensation.

In the face of that provision claims have been presented for extra services performed here and elsewhere by employés of the Government who had been engaged after hours. Some of these claims arose in connection with the life-saving stations. The House conferees, adopting what they believed to be a fair construction of the law, held that a clerk or other employé of the Government should be controlled in the same manner as individuals in the employ of a private person or corporation, and when the necessity arises for additional service, or for working outside of regular hours, should render such service without additional pay. Upon this point arose the difficulty. The Senate proposed to strike out the provision adopted by the House. The conferees have reached a compromise by allowing the House provision to stand with the addition of the words "except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property."

It was urged that there had been, and might again be, occasions when the life-saving organization of the Government might require the service of persons not regularly provided for by law; and for this reason the clause I have just quoted was added.

I believe the Secretary of the Treasury in recently assigning clerks to duty in connection with the rebate of the tobacco tax has adopted the construction of the law for which we contended, and which we claim is justified by the terms of the act. When the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer of the Government has occasion to demand from any clerk or other employé service outside of the usual regulations, the rendering of such service should not, under a proper construction of the law, involve any claim whatever for additional pay.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the conference committee.

The report was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. 264) for the relief of F. G. Schwatka and wife; and

A bill (H. R. 3931) to add certain counties in Alabama to the northern district therein, and to divide the said northern district after the addition of said counties into two divisions, and to prescribe the times and places for holding courts therein, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PLUMB, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK.

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise for the purpose of moving that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar; and pending that motion I move that all debate upon the amendments pending in Committee of the Whole to the bill for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines be limited to ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House (Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

Mr. COSGROVE. I suppose the time will be divided equally. I am willing to do that.

I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], who said that when Mr. Cushing got his confirmation of 10,000 arpents it was a confirmation of all the lands Mrs. Gaines had under what is known as the Urquhart grant, to the petition of Caleb Cushing presented to the Federal court on that question. It is as follows:

> And the petitioner now begs leave to specify the lands which were sold by the said Morales to the said Urquhart and Andry and Pollock and embraced in this claim, and to show their present condition: First, of the 50,000 arpents sold by the said intendant, Morales, to the said Thomas Urquhart on the 29th of November, 1803, there is included in the said conveyance by the said Myra Clark Gaines to the petitioner a tract of 10,263 arpents only.

That settles the question; there was only included 10,000 arpents of the original 50,000.

Mr. COBB. Then why was not the whole claim presented?

Mr. COSGROVE. Simply because only that portion belonged to Mr. Cushing, and not to Mrs Gaines.

Mr. MULDROW. The other part was in possession of Mrs. Gaines.

Mr. COSGROVE. I reserve the remaining portion of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the petition filed by Caleb Cushing in this case, it does not claim that the part he was asking was a part only of this grant, but it sets forth in the beginning he is claiming the whole land.

Mr. MULDROW. That is a mistake.

Mr. SPRINGER. It reads in this wise:

> The petition of Caleb Cushing, of the State of Massachusetts, respectfully shows that by a deed of sale and conveyance to him executed by Myra Clark Gaines, of the city of New Orleans, your petitioner has become owner of the tract of land hereinafter mentioned, situate in the State of Louisiana, between the Mississippi and the Perdido Rivers, and north of the river Iberville; that said Myra Clark Gaines was entitled to the said tract as the sole heir and devisee of the late Daniel Clark, of New Orleans; that the said Daniel Clark acquired the same by deed of sale hereinafter mentioned from Thomas Urquhart, Gilber Andry, and George Pollock, to whom the lands had been sold by one Ventura Morales, acting as intendant of the Spanish province of West Florida.

Now, that is the basis of his claim. It goes on to state subsequently that some one deeded 50,000 acres of this land to some one in Philadelphia, and the sale was declared utterly void.

Mr. MULDROW. It says that it was only a part of the 50,000 arpents.

Mr. SPRINGER. This sets forth a claim of Caleb Cushing, and it says it is for the whole of it and not for a part of it.

One word further. It seems to me such an important matter as this should have been fully understood by the committee which reported it, so that at least we should be able to understand the facts in the case. We may dispute about the law, but there is no reason why we should dispute about the facts.

Mr. MULDROW. What part has not been explained?

Mr. SPRINGER. First, as to whether any part of the original grant is subject to location under this bill. That question has been asked, and it has not yet been answered. We do not know whether any portion of the original grant is subject to location.

Mr. MULDROW. The committee showed there was a grant from Morales to Urquhart for 50,000 arpents of land, and from Morales to Lynd for 32,000 arpents. It showed that Lynd of his grant conveyed to Daniel Clark something over 5,000 arpents. The committee showed that Urquhart had conveyed to Daniel Clark 50,000 arpents which he had obtained from Morales, the intendant of the Spanish province. We showed that Urquhart had paid the Spanish Government solid cash for the grant to him.

Mr. SPRINGER. It seems to me important to know whether we are voting scrip to be located on the public domain or whether we are merely restoring the identical lands to this claimant. That is important, and this committee does not tell us whether we are voting scrip to be located on the public domain or restoring to this claimant the land her ancestors derived from the Spanish Government.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That answers in part the question I desired to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. And that is the very question in dispute, and the committee either do not know or do not state whether we are doing one thing or another. The information is not satisfactory and not sufficient to enable us to act intelligently upon it. It may be that the original land was worth very little, while the scrip may be worth a great deal. Now, let us have the information.

Mr. MULDROW. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that under the provisions of this bill she only gets scrip for the land that was taken.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I want to know what the value of the land taken was and what it is proposed to give in return for it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I wish to ask some member of the committee a question. I understand these grants were fixed originally by proper metes and bounds, and that certain parts of them have been sold and titles made by the Government to various settlers. Now, how much or how large a part of the lands comprised within the original grant now under consideration remains undisposed of in that way, and how much are we to pay, if we were to pay in money value for this property?

Mr. MULDROW. My impression is that there is but little of the original grant remaining. It has been nearly all taken up. Of course land-scrips would be issued in lieu of it.

Mr. COSGROVE. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman last on the floor makes complaint that the committee has not explained this matter fully. If he would read the report of the committee he would find that they have explained fully and thoroughly every proposition embraced; every question that has been asked here on the floor has been fully answered, and it has been shown by the title-bond resting there before the gentleman from Missouri that the same title that covers these 39,000 arpents asked to be confirmed here is the same title on which Caleb Cushing rested his case which was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

And, calling attention to a legal proposition, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, who last raised the question, if Caleb Cushing had in his petition announced the proposition that it was the grant—the original grant—which was conveyed to him, how could that affect the right of a third and disinterested party and who was not a party litigant to the case before the court? I ask him how, as a legal proposition, does he pretend to say that could affect the right of Mrs. Gaines?

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman from Nebraska will pardon me, I will state that if Caleb Cushing had claimed this land in that case, and the court made the award or ruling as to that land, the case is res adjudicata.

Mr. WEAVER. Caleb Cushing claimed that which he had by virtue of a deed which rested upon the same ground as that now upon the table before the gentleman from Missouri; and if his title was good, and the court decided that it was, then Mrs. Gaines's title is good under the same decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I should like to have about ten minutes on this point.

Mr. COSGROVE. I will yield a minute more to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. WEAVER. Calling attention now to the further proposition, the whole objection that has been urged to this bill has been urged to this second section of the bill, and I venture the assertion, and rest it upon the law written on your statute-books, that we needed no second section to the bill. Under the act of Congress providing for the final adjustment of private land claims section 6 of that act covers the land in controversy. By that act, which was passed in 1860, it was provided that in all cases where there had been a finding that any parties were entitled to lands, and the lands had been disposed of by the United States, the United States could issue scrip in lieu thereof; that is, provided it did not exceed in value $1.25 per acre. And now the bill under consideration affirms a finding in its preamble as to the right of this claimant to these 39,000 arpents; and that finding once having been made, it is not necessary for further legislation to entitle this lady to her rights and to her scrip. Now, the law to which I have already referred, and which is in existence upon the statute-books, establishes that right.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

The gentleman from Missouri has one minute remaining.

Mr. COSGROVE. Mr. Chairman, I have, so far as I am individually concerned, as I stated a short time ago, no objection to giving this claimant the money instead of the land-scrip. If I was permitted to act simply upon my own judgment, I would readily assent to that proposition; but acting for the committee, and under its instructions, I am not at liberty to accept the substitute. The question with me as to the statute referred to by the gentleman from Nebraska last on the floor, and also a short time ago by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW], is whether Congress is not compelled in obedience to that statute to grant the land-scrip in this case, and whether if we should adopt the substitute here it would not be in conflict with that act. But I am not prepared to say whether it would or not.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It would repeal it.

Mr. COSGROVE. There is no clause in the substitute repealing that act; and if the substitute should pass, I think it would be in conflict with it.

I presume it would be infinitely better for this lady to have this money. I know nothing of what is her own wish except what I can infer from what I have heard in regard to her poverty and straitened circumstances—for I never saw the lady so far as I am aware; but from what I have heard of her I believe she would infinitely prefer to have the money rather than the land-scrip. I simply submit that to the judgment of the committee. For my own part I shall be compelled under instructions from the committee to vote for the original bill.

Mr. BLAND. Is this a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. COSGROVE. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed by order of the House. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to the substitute.

The question being taken, the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND].

The substitute was adopted.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the bill as amended by the adoption of the substitute be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 7.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum. I call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. COSGROVE, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPRINGER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 137, noes 28.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

The Clerk reported the title of the next bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 3937) for the relief of Willis N. Arnold.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES] who reports this bill to ask that this bill and the one which follows, the bill (H. R. 1477) to pay Hiram Johnson and other persons certain sums of money, be informally passed over without losing their place on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLIN. The two bills go together.

There being no objection, the two bills indicated were informally passed over without losing their place on the Calendar.

MRS. MARGARET CASSIDY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Margaret Cassidy, widow of Peter A. Cassidy, deceased, $2,500, in full compensation for the past, present, and future use of the patent of said Peter A. Cassidy for his invention of machine for cutting vellum cloth.

The report (by Mr. MOREY, from the Committee on Patents) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1370) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy, having considered the same, and accompanying papers, recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as a substitute for bill H. R. 1370.

The facts upon which this recommendation is based are so fully set forth in House Report No. 1768, Forty-sixth Congress, second session, that your committee ask to make it a part of their report, and append papers that are pertinent.

[House Report 1768, Forty-sixth Congress, second session.]

"The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Peter A. Cassidy for compensation for a machine invented by her late husband and now in use by the Government, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

"This claim was considered and favorably reported upon by the Committee of Claims of the Forty-fifth Congress (Forty-fifth Congress, third session, Report No. 8), but no final action was reached.

"Their report was as follows:

"'Peter A. Cassidy was employed in the Second Auditor's Office of the Treasury Department from August 1, 1867, to October 10, 1876. While thus employed he invented and caused to be patented a machine for cutting the vellum cloth extensively used in repairing vouchers, &c. By means of this machine he was enabled to do the work which would otherwise have required five men. This is shown by the Auditor, and the machine is still in use, and is considered indispensable by the Auditor. By a statement of Joseph Barton, now in charge of archives division, under the old plan two men could cut twenty-five strips in five cuts; by the new device one man can cut fifty strips in two cuts.

"'The machine was patented July 11, 1876. Peter A. Cassidy died in January, 1878, without having received any compensation from the Government for the use of his invention, and his attending physician, William Ward, says that this circumstance preyed upon his mind and added to the causes that produced his death. He left the petitioner (his widow) and eight children. She asks that the Government pay to her the sum of $10,000 for the use of her husband's invention. By the use of the machine one person can do the work of twenty-five.

"'It is manifestly just that the Government should pay for the use of the patent, and we think $2,500 not an unreasonable sum for that use. We therefore report the accompanying bill with the recommendation that it do pass.'

"This committee concur in the conclusions and recommendations of the former committee, and report the accompanying bill."

APPENDIX.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
October 1, 1877.

Peter Cassidy was employed in this office from August 1, 1867, to October 10, 1876, during which time he performed his duties satisfactorily. While employed here, Mr. Cassidy invented and caused to be patented a machine for cutting the vellum cloth used extensively in repairing vouchers. By means of this invention he was enabled to do the work which would other wise have required five men. The original machine is still in use every day in this office and is considered indispensable.

E. B. FRENCH, Auditor.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 3, 1882.

SIR: In reply to your indorsement of the 1st instant, requesting to be furnished with the information called for by the inclosed letter from the subcommittee on patents, United States Senate, I have the honor to make the following report:

First. The Department is still using Peter A. Cassidy's patented machine for cutting vellum cloth.

Second. The Department has never, to my knowledge, compensated said Cassidy for the use of said invention, and I have no reason to believe he was ever so compensated.

For a period of nearly four years, commencing in the year 1875, women, averaging over thirty in number, were constantly employed in this office in mending mutilated Army rolls. In that work they used vellum cloth cut in slips. Mr. Cassidy invented his machine and put it in operation some time in the spring of 1876. It was subsequently patented.

* * * * * * *

Adopting Mr. French's estimate—that one man with the machine will do the work which would otherwise have required five men—and I believe that estimate to be a fair one—I am enabled to approximate the value of the machine to the Government.

Since January 1, 1876, 1,780 rolls of cloth have been purchased and used in mending mutilated Army rolls. The cutting of twelve rolls with the machine is a fair day's work. The 1,780 rolls would in that way be cut in six months, and the labor of four men for six months or one man for two years saved.

I think $2,500 would be an adequate sum for the Government to pay for the past, present, and future use of the machine.

Very respectfully,

O. FERRISS, Auditor.

Hon. CHAS. J. FOLGER,
Secretary of the Treasury.

[Decision by the Supreme Court—The United States vs. Burns (Wallace's Reports, vol. 12, page 242, December term, 1870).]

If an officer in the military service, not specially employed to make experiments with a view to suggest improvements, devises a new and valuable improvement in arms, tents, or any other kind of war material, he is entitled to the benefit of it, and to letters patent for the improvement from the United States equally with any other citizen not engaged in such service; and the Government can not, after the patent is issued, make use of the improvement any more than a private individual without license of the inventor or making compensation to him.

The following decision is also pertinent:

"Public employment is no defense to the employé for having converted the private property of another to the public use without his consent and without just compensation. Private property, the Constitution provides, shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, and it is clear that that provision is as applicable to the Government as to individuals." * * * (Mitchell vs. Harmony, 13 How., 134; U. S. vs. Russell, 13 Wall., 627.)

Mr. VANCE. My colleague on the committee [Mr. MOREY] is not present, but the facts in this case are all set forth in the report made by that gentleman.

The bill has received the sanction of the Committee on Patents in three if not in four different Congresses. It has now the unanimous sanction of the committee of the present Congress. We think it is right. This woman, for whose benefit the bill is presented, has a large family and she has no other resource. She has no one else to look to in regard to the value of the patent, as the Government alone makes use of it. If there be no objection I will move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire before that is done to ask a question or two. I understand the inventor of the machine was in the employment of the Government?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir; he was.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. In the Second Auditor's Office. Was this work entirely independent of the work he was employed to do?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It formed no part of the work for which he was paid?

Mr. VANCE. It was a different thing, entirely.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Did the inventor derive any profit from his invention outside of the Government?

Mr. VANCE. I said a moment ago he did not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It has not gone into use anywhere?

Mr. VANCE. No, sir. No one except the Government uses it. It is used for making army rolls and things of that kind.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is more particularly adapted for the use of the Government?

Mr. VANCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It would seem an invention worth $2,500 to the Government might be worth something to others.

Mr. VANCE. It has not been used by any one else.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALONZO GESNER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1299) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to approve for payment, if on examination he finds the surveys were made in accordance with the report and approval of the surveyor-general of the State of Oregon of date December 1, 1877, certain surveys of the public lands made by Deputy-Surveyor Alonzo Gesner, namely: Townships 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 south, range 16 east of Willamette meridian, making 54 miles and 3.09 chains of township lines, and 300 miles and 61.92 chains of section lines, at the rate of $7 per mile for township and $6 per mile for section lines, amounting, in all, to $2,182.91.

Mr. GEORGE. As this bill has already passed the Senate in three different Congresses, and has been twice unanimously recommended by committees of this House, unless some gentleman desires the reading of the report I shall move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (made by Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred bill H. R. 1299, having had the same under consideration, submit as their report thereon the report of this committee in the Forty-seventh Congress.

The following is the report of said committee:

[House Report No. 1012, Forty-seventh Congress, first session.]

"Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1367:

"The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1367) for the relief of Alonzo Gesner, having had the same under consideration, report the same back with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

"A bill identical with this (No. 53) has passed the Senate at the present session. The facts in relation thereto are set forth at length in the report of the Senate Committee on Public Lands (No. 53 of the present session), and your committee adopt said Senate report as a statement of the reasons why the bill should pass, namely:

"'It appears from the papers in this case that Alonzo Gesner, of Oregon, on September 6, 1876, entered into a contract, No. 251, with the United States surveyor-general of Oregon, to survey public lands in said State, described as follows, to wit:

"'Fourth standard parallel southwest, through ranges 20, 19, 18 east, to the intersection with the Des Chutes meridian; and also the exterior boundaries of townships 18, 19, 20 south, ranges 18, 19, 20 east, and townships 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 south, range 17 east; and also the subdivisional lines of townships 18, 19, 20 south, ranges 19, 20 east, and townships 18, 19 south, range 18 east, and townships 16, 17, 18 south, range 17 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon.

"'That on April 7, 1877, Alonzo Gesner, from his camp in the field on Bear Creek, Wasco County, Oregon, wrote to the United States surveyor-general of Oregon, calling his attention to the large settlement then being made in townships 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20 south, range 16 east, and that the settlers therein were desirous of the survey of the above-described lands. That these townships contained a large area of excellent and valuable agricultural lands, and also abounded in rich mineral deposits. That being on the ground, and in view of the great expense of transporting a surveying party to this remote distance and back, Alonzo Gesner asked the United States surveyor-general of Oregon that he be permitted to proceed at once to the survey of the townships named, and that they be added to his contract of September 6, 1876; and that, feeling assured of the compliance of the said United States surveyor-general with his said request, he further stated that he should proceed at once to the survey of the exterior and subdivisional lines of said townships, trusting to secure the approval of said United States surveyor-general thereto.

"'That on April 19, 1877, the bondsmen of said Alonzo Gesner gave their consent that said Gesner might survey the exterior and section lines of said townships 16, 17, 18, 19, 20 south, range 16 east, amounting to 54 miles and 3.09 chains of exterior lines, and 300 miles and 61.92 chains of section lines, and which, at the rate of $7 per mile for township and $6 per mile for section lines, amounted to $2,182.91. That on August 18, 1877, said surveys were authorized by said United States surveyor-general of Oregon, upon the condition that the consent of his bondsmen be obtained, and the United States surveyor-general, deeming it to be for the best interests of the Government, asked the Commissioner of the General Land Office to approve the same. That on December 28, 1877, the United States surveyor-general for Oregon indorsed the account of said Alonzo Gesner to the Commissioner of the General Land Office as United States deputy surveyor for his said work done under his said contract of September 6, 1876, and also with the permission of his bondsmen and with his approval. All of which the Commissioner of the General Land Office, on January 23, 1878, disallowed, for the reason that the same had not been included in the original contract of Alonzo Gesner, and which had been approved by the Commissioner. That the account for the work of said deputy surveyor was approved by the surveyor-general of Oregon on December 10, 1877, and forwarded to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is now of record in the United States Treasury Department. That the field-notes of the said surveys were duly approved by the surveyor-general December 1, 1877.

"'That duplicate township plats of said surveys were duly made and filed in the United States local land offices at The Dalles and Lake View, Oreg., on December 20 and December 30, 1877, respectively, and copies thereof forwarded to the Commissioner of the General Land Office. That the said township plats have never been withdrawn from the local land offices, but that the same remain on file and of record in said offices; and that the lands so surveyed are, and have been since the filing of the plats, subject to entry as public lands under the laws of the United States. That said surveys amount to 54 miles 3 chains and 9 links of township lines and 300 miles 61 chains and 92 links of section lines, and which, at $7 per mile for township lines and $6 per mile for section lines, amounts to the sum of $2,182.91; and which amount is still unpaid and claimed as due said Alonzo Gesner on account of said surveys.

"'That a bill for the payment of the amount due Alonzo Gesner (S. 734) passed the Senate on June 19, 1878 (see Senate Journal, second session, Forty-fifth Congress, p. 779, June 19, 1878); and which bill was thereafter referred to the Committee on the Public Lands of the House, by it favorably considered, and by it ordered to be favorably reported to the House with a recommendation that it should pass, but which report failed to be made to the House in time to be acted upon during the Forty-fifth Congress. That the amount as stated in said Senate bill No. 734 was $3,033.27; but that since the date of the introduction of the pending bill there has been paid of said amount the sum of $850.36 for the survey of two townships, in pursuance of the original contract and certain substitutions thereunder, leaving still unpaid the sum of $2,182.91 on account of said surveys.'"

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as reported.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If this bill is to give rise to any discussion, I shall move that the committee rise.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think the committee should rise.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COX, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar under consideration, and had directed him to report back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 1000) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines with an amendment, and the bill (H. R. 3950) for the relief of Mrs. Margaret Cassidy without amendment.

SANTIAGO DE LEON.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon, coming over from Friday last as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the passage of the bill; and upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered by the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. The yeas and nays on this bill were ordered on my demand. The vote by yeas and nays was taken on Friday last and resulted in no quorum voting; but there was such a large majority in favor of the passage of the bill that I do not desire to insist further upon the yeas and nays. The object I had in view was merely to ascertain the pleasure of the House on a claim of this character.

The SPEAKER. Then if there be no objection the order of the House directing the yeas and nays to be taken on the passage of this bill will be vacated.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill was then passed.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, coming over from Friday last, was the bill (H. R. 3935) to relieve certain soldiers of the late war from the charge of desertion.

The SPEAKER. This bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole with sundry amendments.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I ask that the amendments be read, and I would be very glad for the House to preserve order while they are being read by the Clerk, as this is a very important bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, strike out the word "twenty-second" and insert the word "first;" so that it will read: "or until the first day of May, 1865."

In line 11, after the word "company," insert the words "or in the United States naval forces;" so that it will read: "or who subsequently enlisted in another regiment or company or in the United States naval forces."

At the end of line 13, section 2 of the printed bill, insert the following:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any soldier who willfully deserted for the purpose of obtaining a bounty or other pecuniary reward by re-enlistment; and the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War after an investigation of the facts."

At the end of section 4 add the following:

"Unless such absence without leave resulted from his confinement as a prisoner of war."

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote asked on any of these amendments?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask a separate vote on the amendment next to the last.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I hope the gentleman who may be in charge of this bill will allow the suggestion of an amendment to the amendment proposed to the second section. That amendment contains certain provisions as to soldiers, using the word "soldier" only. The bill is intended to apply to soldiers, sailors, and marines. I suggest that the amendment should be modified in that respect.

Mr. GEDDES. There can be no objection to that; it was an inadvertence, I think, that the words the gentleman indicates were left out.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Then I move to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "soldier," the words "sailor or marine."

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the words suggested will be inserted in the amendment.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The SPEAKER. The amendment as modified will be again read.

Insert at the end of line 13, section 2, the following:

"Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not be applicable to any soldier, sailor, or marine who willfully deserted for the purpose of obtaining a bounty or other pecuniary reward by re-enlistment; and the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War after an investigation of the facts."

Mr. HOLMAN. The last clause of that amendment I think neutralizes the entire effect of the provision. That discretion is already lodged in the Secretary of War by an act of the last Congress.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would ask the gentleman if he proposes to submit the question of relieving a sailor or marine from the charge of desertion to the Secretary of War? Ought that not to be determined by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not referring to that so much as to the effect of the last clause of the amendment, which leaves every case of relief provided for by this bill to the discretion of the Secretary of War. That discretion is already vested in him, and gentlemen are aware that the present law is entirely inoperative.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. On that account?

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out these words:

And the granting of relief in each case shall be discretionary with the Secretary of War after an investigation of the facts.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That will strike out entirely the discretionary part, will it not?

Mr. HOLMAN. It will.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And makes the operation of this bill absolute if it shall become a law?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Both for meritorious and unmeritorious soldiers.

Mr. HOLMAN. All alike.

Mr. STORM. If it is not stricken out it will kill the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not think the House is ready to pass a measure which shall put upon precisely the same plane the intentional deserter and the meritorious soldier, the man who fought the war through and the man who deserted, no matter what the purpose of the desertion might be. It seems to me it will be doing great injustice to the deserving soldier to put him upon the same footing with the man who intentionally deserted his colors and his command, it may be while in the field.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And in the face of the enemy.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Many such desertions were possibly made for the purpose of obtaining the large bounty offered. The discretion and the power of examining into the facts of each case certainly ought to be lodged somewhere.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Well.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the Secretary of War, by an act of the last Congress, already invested with the discretionary power to relieve a soldier from the charge of desertion in every case where he may be entitled to relief?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not understand that he has the power now except in certain cases.

Mr. CURTIN. He says he has not; and he is supported by the opinion of the Solicitor.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend remembers very well the act of last session, in which, after it passed the House, the Senate inserted a provision giving this discretionary power to the Secretary of War; and this discretion was found at once to make the act nugatory.

Mr. STORM. The gentleman is mistaken; it was the words "intentionally deserted" that caused the difficulty.

Mr. HOLMAN. If members of the House desire not to accomplish the relief which this bill started out to afford, of course the language to which I have referred should remain in the bill. But if it is right that relief should be granted in the cases included by the bill, why not have that relief become directly operative by virtue of the law instead of depending upon the discretion of the head of the War Department?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The reason for conferring a discretionary power upon the Secretary of War is this: It is difficult to frame a law in general terms which will not possibly include both the deserving and the undeserving; and the object of this discretion on the part of the Secretary of War is that he may make an investigation in each case and discriminate so as not to grant relief to those who deserted for the purpose of escaping military service or for the purpose of obtaining bounty by joining another regiment. The Secretary of War is authorized by this provision to inquire into the circumstances under which in each case the desertion took place. It seems to me very necessary that this power should be lodged with that officer. We should not pass a sweeping measure which may include those who really intended to desert as well as those who were erroneously marked as deserters.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does my friend mean to say that this bill covers everybody?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Pretty nearly everybody.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HOLMAN. Surely the bill does not authorize an honorable discharge to a soldier who intentionally deserted, who was, for instance, a "bounty-jumper."

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, who has the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] took the floor, and as the previous question was not demanded he was entitled to the floor for an hour.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JONES], reserving the residue of my time.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had sat down; and I think I am entitled to recognition.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman wish to move the previous question?

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I surrender the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. This bill has already been debated for two days; and I think the House is tired of the discussion. I have risen for the purpose merely of moving the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves the previous question upon the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House, and upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. STEELE. I desire to move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order at this time; it will be at a later stage.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw the call for the previous question, in order that a motion may be made to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs. The bill is so confused in its present form——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN to the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House, it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The next question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. Is it in order to demand a separate vote on each of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

Mr. ROGERS, of Arkansas. I make that demand.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the first amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The previous question having now been ordered, may I not move at this time to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. Not at this time. The gentleman may move to recommit when the previous question is demanded on the passage of the bill.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar were then severally read and agreed to.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Is it in order at this stage of the proceedings, by unanimous consent, to offer an amendment applying the provisions of this bill to the Navy as well as to the Army?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I ask unanimous consent, then, and the committee are ready to accept such an amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; I object.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. SPRINGER. I suggest the gentleman modify his motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. I will modify my motion in that respect and move the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The reason why I did not make the motion in that way in the first instance was that I am myself a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 61, nays 73.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. JONES, of Wisconsin, and Mr. STEELE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 55, nays 104.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. RANDALL. Several members have come into the House since the division, and I suggest the tellers retain their places.

Mr. STEELE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The vote has been announced, and no quorum has voted.

Mr. STEELE. I move the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to take a recess when a quorum has not voted.

Mr. STEELE. Then, I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is on the motion to refer to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. It will save time to have the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCOID. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

Mr. HAMMOND. And I ask for tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Only twenty-four have voted in the affirmative, which is not a sufficient number.

Mr. STEELE. Count the other side.

The SPEAKER. There is no other side. The rules of the House direct that one-fifth of a quorum shall be necessary to order tellers, and that is fixed.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEELE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COSGROVE. The gentleman voted on the other side.

The SPEAKER. But there was no record of the vote.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. CANNON. And on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Twenty-six have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. MONEY. Count the other side.

Mr. STEELE. The time has arrived for taking a recess, and I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House, a recess will now be taken until half past 7 o'clock this evening, for the purpose of considering pension bills on the Private Calendar. At the evening session the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

And then (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the House took a recess until 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m. was called to order by Mr. McMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the order under which the House assembles to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That until the further order of this House, on each Friday the House will take a recess at 5 o'clock until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions shall be considered.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar under the order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that we pass over informally all of the bills which may be upon the Calendar until we reach the bill H. R. 1164, at the top of page 29.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

ELENOR STOUGH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elenor Stough, widow of George W. Stough, late major of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Mr. MATSON. The report in this case has been read at a former sitting of the House. I move, therefore, that the amendment proposed by the committee, which is to add the words "from and after the passage of this act," be agreed to.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANCES E. HENDRICKS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2059) to increase the pension of Frances E. Hendricks, reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that that bill be passed over informally to-night, to retain its position upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY L. AND ELLA WALKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill of the Senate (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to direct the payment, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, sole surviving daughters of Lieut. Col. Calvin Walker, late of the Thirty-third Regiment of New York State Volunteers, the pension granted by certificate No. 209900, to the said Calvin Walker, computing the amount due to the day of his death only.

The report is as follows:

Mr. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 465:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, having considered the same, report as follows:

That this case was considered by the Senate Committee on Pensions at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, and report thereon (No. 963) made as follows:

"The claimants, Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, are the sole surviving daughters and children of Lieut. Col. Calvin Walker, late of the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteers. Colonel Walker applied for a pension on account of disabilities received in the service and in the line of duty, and completed his proofs during his lifetime.

"The case in the Pension Office was submitted for admission on the 8th of May, 1882, and was subsequently allowed at the rate of $7.50 per month from the 4th day of October, 1861, but the certificate therefor was not issued until the 27th day of May, 1882. Colonel Walker died on the same day and about four hours after the certificate in his case was issued as aforesaid. The Commissioner of Pensions construes the law governing the payment of pensions to be that the representatives of a pensioner in case of death are not entitled to receive the pension granted the decedent unless the check for the amount allowed is received and indorsed by the pensioner.

"The committee are of the opinion, however, that in cases where the pension certificate has been actually issued before the death of the person found to be entitled to a pension there is equity and justice in paying the amount so allowed to the needy children of the pensioner, as in the present case.

"The committee, upon a careful examination of all the facts bearing upon the case, deem it a deserving and meritorious one for special legislation."

The present bill is in the exact language of the one then reported.

Your committee, believing that the above report correctly sets forth the material facts in the case, adopt it, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. APOLLINE A. BLAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2984) granting arrears of pension to Apolline A. Blair, widow of the late General Francis P. Blair.

Mr. MATSON. I ask unanimous consent that we also pass over this bill informally for this evening, on account of the absence of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BROADHEAD].

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN GALLOUP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of John Galloup, late a corporal of Company F, Sixty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report is as follows:

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 555:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 12, 1862, and was discharged November 25, 1864. His service was in Company F, Sixty-ninth Regiment Enrolled Missouri Militia. His application for pension was made April, 1882. Paragraph 3, section 4693 of Revised Statutes, provides that pension claims of militiamen must be proved prior to July 4, 1874.

The evidence is clear that he received his disability in the service, and the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this report is very brief and does not tell us what the disability was, or that he had any disability. "The evidence is clear" is all that is said upon the subject "that he received his disability in the service." There is nothing, however, in the report or in the bill to show what the disability was. It nowhere appears from the report that he has any disability at all. This is one of these militiamen of Missouri, and I would like to have some information upon this point.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Alabama that the wounds referred to were proven to the satisfaction of the Pension Office, and no question was made on that ground. No point was made against the applicant by reason of that fact, but under this section (4693, paragraph 3) of the Revised Statutes it is provided that the claims of these militiamen must be proved prior to July 4, 1874. Not knowing that, or for some other reason, he did not put in his application in time. For that reason the office could not allow the pension. This House during the present session has made an invariable rule to grant pensions to that class of people, and it has been done in some dozen or more cases. I know that I reported five cases of that kind myself. I did not suppose, therefore, in preparing the report that there was any necessity for setting forth the facts as to the disability for the reason that it had been proven to the satisfaction of the Pension Department.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I only wanted an explanation as to the case, as I thought it best the House should understand exactly the circumstances. I make no objection to the claim on the statement made.

Mr. MORRILL. Thank you.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DECATUR HAMLIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to Decatur Hamlin.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Decatur Hamlin, employed as scout for the Tenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, and who, while in action, received wounds that compelled the amputation of a leg.

The report is as follows:

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made the following report to accompany bill H. R. 2070:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to Decatur Hamlin, submit the following report:

The claimant was never mustered into the United States service. In 1861 he accompanied the Tenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers (a three months' regiment) in its campaign in West Virginia as a volunteer aid or scout, without pay or allowance of any kind, and did valuable service in that capacity, and especially so at the battle of Rich Mountain. The colonel of the Tenth Indiana Regiment urged Mr. Hamlin to be mustered into the service, or take some position where he could receive pay, but he declined, stating that he had a competency and did not desire any compensation. He continued to perform the duties of a scout until the Tenth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers was mustered out of service.

In July, 1862, he went to Saint Louis and offered his services to General Frank P. Blair, who accepted them, and sent him in charge of quartermaster stores down the Mississippi River. After making several trips, one of which was to Milliken's Bend, La., General Blair ordered him to take charge of hospital stores, receiving and shipping them on steamboats, and delivering them at the several hospitals on the river. The most of these goods were voluntary contributions from the loyal citizens of the North, and were sent to the hospitals at Memphis, Helena, and Milliken's Bend. He was thus employed until November, 1863, when, by order of General Blair, he took charge of a large amount of supplies on steamer J. C. Swan, with orders to ship the same to Memphis, Natchez, Baton Rouge, and New Orleans. After performing this duty he took passage on the steamer Henry von Phul, having in his charge two sick furloughed Illinois soldiers, who were returning to their homes. At Morganzia Bend a rebel battery of six guns opened fire on the steamer, one of the balls striking claimant on the right leg just below the knee, shattering the bone and tearing the flesh in a terrible manner, necessitating the amputation of the limb above the knee.

For all this service claimant makes affidavit that he never asked or received from the United States Government any compensation whatever; that he had at that time a competency and therefore gave his services freely, without desire or expectation of pay; that he was during this time offered positions in the service which would have been both honorable and remunerative, but that he declined them because he wanted to give his services to his country.

Claimant has since lost his property, largely owing to his disability, and now needs the aid of that Government that he so unselfishly served in 1862 and 1863.

The testimony in this case is of a high order, is clear and conclusive; a large number of prominent and credible witnesses speak in warm terms of the high character and standing of the claimant. Had he been mustered into service he would have received a liberal pension for the past twenty years. His services were more valuable to the country than they could possibly have been as a private soldier.

Believing that his unselfish devotion to his country entitles him to her warmest gratitude and to a hearty and generous support during his declining years, your committee recommend the passage of this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I just want to call the attention of the committee one moment to this case. This report gives the service of this man, and says that he was not an enlisted soldier, but was performing military service. After performing this duty he took passage on a steamer, having in his charge two sick furloughed Illinois soldiers returning to their homes, and on the steamer while on that service he was wounded. Now, if he had been a soldier, regularly enlisted, and was returning home on the steamer and was wounded, he would not have been entitled to a pension under the law. It seems that after he had performed the military service which he had voluntarily agreed to perform without pay, and doubtless deserves credit for that, and ought to have pay, yet he gets aboard the steamer returning home, had quit the service, and was on his way as any other citizen, and he is wounded by some battery of the enemy. Now, it seems to me that he was not more than a citizen.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. This man was on duty in the command of General Blair. He had been ordered down the river under charge of hospital stores and was on his return to his place of duty. He was on duty.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The report does not show that.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the fact. He did not return on the vessel in consequence of its being detained in the distribution of the stores; and as he was returning to his place of duty the soldiers were put under his charge.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If those are the facts a very different case is presented.

Mr. PERKINS. Those are the facts.

Mr. MORRILL. This report does not say he was returning home; he had been down the river with the stores and was returning to Saint Louis, where he had been ordered from. His was one of the most peculiar cases I have met with in all my experience. Having a competency he decided to serve in the war without receiving a dollar of pay. He did so and was wounded as is here stated. The evidence is clearer, more concise, and stronger than in almost any case I have seen. The steamboat he went down on was not prepared to return when he was going back, and the commanding officer put these sick soldiers in his charge to take them back to Saint Louis.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ZELICA T. DUNLAP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4041) restoring the name of Zelica T. Dunlap to the pension-roll.

The bill was reported with amendments. As proposed to be amended it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Zelica T. Dunlap, late widow of the late Lieut. Col. James E. Dunlap, of the Twenty-ninth Illinois Infantry, to be paid from the date of the passage of this act.

The committee also recommended that the title be amended so as to read as follows:

A bill granting a pension to Zelica T. Dunlap.

The report (by Mr. HOLMES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4041 for the relief of Zelica T. Dunlap, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Lieut. Col. James E. Dunlap, of the Twenty-ninth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, was commissioned in the United States service August 27, 1861, and resigned by the advice of military surgeon, because of serious disease contracted during the siege of Fort Donelson, and died therefrom May 12, 1863, leaving this claimant as his widow, and one young child dependent upon her.

Congress granted claimant a pension under the name of Zelica T. Dunlap, by special act, on the 3d day of March, 1871. Meantime the widow, being in reduced circumstances financially, remarried on the 6th day of February, 1870, and prior to the passage of the bill granting her a pension. This marriage, instead of relieving her from her embarrassments, proved most unfortunate, and was followed by desertion and divorce, the latter being granted by decree of court on the 10th day of May, 1883.

It appears that the pension granted her by act of Congress was passed after and during her second marriage; but, under the construction of the law by the Pension Office, it was decided that she could not take the benefit of the relief so ordered by Congress, and no money has been paid to her thereon. Under these circumstances, and in view of the intention of the former act, of which she has had no benefit, the committee recommend that the provision for her relief be passed, to take effect from and after the passage of the act.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that the bill do pass, with an amendment providing that said pension shall be granted subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, and striking out of said bill the provision as to restoring her to the pension-roll.

Mr. VAN ALSTYNE. It strikes me this is one of the cases which on grounds of public policy should not pass without objection. We are always disposed to grant pensions in deserving cases, and in many instances perhaps we grant them on very slight grounds. But there are instances where principles are involved which should lead us to hesitate somewhat.

I suppose the stability of society depends very much on the sacredness of the household, and it appears to me there is that involved in this bill which tends to impair that relationship.

It seems that this party was granted by act of Congress heretofore a pension for the reason that she was then supposed to be a widow of a deceased soldier and that she was in embarrassed pecuniary circumstances. It turned out, however, that instead of her being a widow she was a married woman, and when the act was presented to the Department for recognition and payment they entered a protest, that she being a married woman was not entitled to receive the benefit under the act. She has not, therefore, been the recipient of the pension.

For some reasons she sought to obtain a divorce from her husband. The committee indicate in their report that the husband was of that character or possessed of those habits that would not commend him as a proper companion in life, and that therefore she sought relief and obtained a divorce from him. That may be true; but it strikes me the committee ought to hesitate and inquire whether it be so as a matter of fact.

I venture to say that there are many instances where, if the circumstances were like those in this case, there would be a very strong inducement for separation from the husband, and strategy might be resorted to to effect a separation to the extent of a divorce in law. That, sir, is the ground of my objection, and I think it should address itself to the consideration of this committee with some considerable force, whether or no the Congress of the United States should lend its aid to the procurement of a divorce between husband and wife to enable the divorced wife to obtain a considerable sum of money from the Government for her support and maintenance.

Mr. HOLMES. I did not understand from the remarks of the gentleman from New York that he made objection to granting a pension to this widow of Lieutenant-Colonel Dunlap on the ground that she was not entitled to a pension. I understood him rather to base his objection merely on the ground that divorces might be procured hereafter for the purpose of getting pensions. It can not be denied that Lieutenant-Colonel Dunlap was a very able and efficient officer, and that he sacrificed his life in the Army for the benefit of his country. There can be no doubt that he died of disease contracted in the Army; that he died during the war immediately after going out of the service.

It is true Congress granted this claimant a pension. She not knowing of the fact that a pension was about to be granted, remarried about that time. But as a matter of fact and of date the pension was granted a short time after her marriage, she knowing nothing of it.

She has a child dependent upon her for support. Her second husband proved to be not what she thought him, to put it in the mildest form. Her alliance was an unfortunate one, indeed, and she procured a divorce from him. She now stands before this Congress no better and no worse from the fact of having married the man with whom she lived but a short time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question at this point?

Mr. HOLMES. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not the fact that in all cases where pensions are granted under the general law to widows of deceased soldiers and they marry again the pension ceases on the second marriage?

Mr. HOLMES. That is true under the general law.

Mr. McMILLIN. And is it not also the fact that the death of the second husband fails to revive the pension on behalf of the widow?

Mr. HOLMES. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then what policy can justify us in doing that which is practically a reward for voluntary separation, when it is not done in the case of the death of the second husband?

Mr. HOLMES. That is just what I am going to inform you of.

Mr. McMILLIN. You will have some difficulty in explaining the matter satisfactorily.

Mr. HOLMES. If parties applying for pensions were bound by the decision of the Pension Office, then there would be no use whatever in their coming before this House with bills for relief. If we were bound by the decisions of that office in reference to granting pensions, either for the last war or any other war, then there would be no use in applicants bringing their cases here. But we are continually reversing the rules of the Pension Office by our action here. This House has no rule except the rule of right and justice in granting pensions as I understand it.

Mr. McMILLIN. Another question, and on that point.

Mr. HOLMES. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do you think that by Congressional action there should be any greater favor bestowed on a divorced widow in a case like this than would be bestowed upon a widow in the case of the death of the second husband? As to the question of justice, I would like the gentleman to answer, especially when it is remembered that these divorced widows have voluntarily placed themselves in a position to forfeit the pension granted them on account of the death and services of their first husband.

Mr. HOLMES. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking him one. I will ask him this question, whether or not it is true that her husband having been a gallant and meritorious officer during the war she is not as much entitled to a pension as is the widow of a brigadier-general or major-general who has obtained the passage of a bill in this House for a pension entirely irrespective of their circumstances?

Mr. McMILLIN. I will say to the gentleman that I think there should be no pension granted in the case of a person divorced after a second marriage.

Mr. HOLMES. That may be a matter of taste, but it does not affect the equities of this case in the least.

Mr. McMILLIN. As to the question of granting a pension to a widow of a brigadier-general, I will state to the gentleman that I do not agree to the doctrine that there should be a large pension granted to the widow of an officer and a small pension granted to the widow of a private soldier.

Mr. HOLMES. The gentleman and myself might or might not differ about that. But I am talking now about what Congress has done in the past, what has been the rule which has governed Congress. I say that there has been no rule governing Congress in the matter of granting these pensions, except the rule of the meritorious circumstances attending each case. And I say that if there ever was a meritorious case it is the case of Lieutenant-Colonel Dunlap and the applicant here, his wife, who appears before the House asking for a pension.

The objection is urged here that this lady married again. I would ask if marriage wipes out in full the equities of this lady? That is the question. If her first husband had not become disabled in the service, if he had not entered the service at all, is it not a fact that he probably would have been living at this time and been able to support his wife by his own exertions? The reasons why she is now obliged to rely upon her own labors for her own support is that she sacrificed her husband to her country, and because of that circumstance she has not to-day the benefit of the support which he would otherwise have been able to provide for her. I understand that the second marriage was only for a few months.

Mr. STRUBLE. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. HOLMES. With pleasure.

Mr. STRUBLE. I came in rather late, and did not hear the reading of the bill and the report. I would inquire of my colleague what rate of pension is proposed to be given by the bill?

Mr. HOLMES. That will be governed by the limitations and provisions of the pension laws. I do not know of any reason why this bill is not an equitable bill. I do not know why it should be refused merely for some little technicality.

If this bill is to be refused on account of some little technicality, why not then refuse all the pension bills which are brought here because of some technicality raised in the Pension Bureau, and not attempt to pass any bill unless the rules which govern the pension service authorize a pension to be granted? If we are here to raise objections to these bills on account of a second marriage, for instance, or because some "i" is not dotted or some "t" is not crossed, then we might as well abandon all the pension business that comes before Congress.

Congress sits here as a sort of appellate court, as it were, in these pension cases which have been rejected for some technicality or other by the Pension Bureau. This is not a case in which the widow applies for a pension twenty years or more after the death of her husband. There is no doubt at all about the circumstances which surround this case.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that this is a perfectly good case; and the mere technicality that this lady has been remarried for a short time should not prevail against the granting of the pension. I certainly trust that gentlemen will not press the objection.

The amendments reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

SARAH J. CHIPMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5686) granting a pension to Sarah J. Chipman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah J. Chipman, widow of Charles B. Chipman, deceased, late a private in Company C, Ninth Veteran Reserve Corps, such pension to be granted from and after the passage of this act.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 5686):

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1992) for the relief of Sarah J. Chipman, widow of Charles B. Chipman, deceased, having had the same under consideration, report as follows:

Charles B. Chipman, deceased, claimant's husband, enlisted on the 6th day of May, 1861, in Company I, Third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers. He re-enlisted in Company I, Third Regiment Veteran Reserve Corps, and was afterward transferred to Company C, Ninth Veteran Reserve Corps. He was mustered out of the service August 24, 1866, having been in continuous service more than five years. The record and evidence shows that up to the time of his enlistment, and for a considerable time afterward, he was a sound man. While in the service the soldier, on or about May 1, 1864, contracted amaurosis (paralysis of the retina) in both eyes, which almost entirely destroyed the sight.

About August 1, 1873, in the city of Washington, D. C., the soldier fell, as would appear, from inability to see his way, struck his head upon the sidewalk or curbstone, was found lying there delirious. This fall, as all the evidence shows, caused insanity, and the soldier was shortly after taken to the Government Hospital for the Insane, in the District of Columbia, where he died, June 25, 1875, of epileptic convulsion and organic disease of the brain. The soldier had been pensioned from August 24, 1866, at $8 per month, on account of amaurosis of both eyes. This pension was increased to $20 on May 28, 1870, and to $24 by act of June 8, 1872, and December, 1874, to $50 a month.

The application for pension by this claimant was rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that the malady of which the soldier died was not contracted in the service, and that it was not the direct result of any disease so contracted. Your committee hardly think it possible to read the evidence in this case without coming to the conclusion that this soldier's disability and death were the result of the loss of sight acquired in the service, on account of which he stumbled over a stone in his way, seriously injured his head, became insane, and died as stated. The examining surgeons who investigated his case reported as follows:

W. D. Stewart, M. D., says:

"This man's vision was good from the time he entered the service in May 6, 1861, to June, 1864, over three years. At this time he observed that his eyesight was failing. The history and symptoms as stated by him is that of subacute inflammation of the retina of both eyes, resulting in complete and probably incurable amaurosis from fatigue and exposure in the line of military duty."

W. W. Potter, examining surgeon, says:

"Has amaurosis of both eyes; vision nearly destroyed; only large objects in immediate proximity to eye can be discerned. In walking upon the street a personal attendant is required, and for many other purposes assistance is needed. Disability equivalent to the loss of a foot and hand and permanent in its present degree. Total, second grade."

J. O. Stanton, examining surgeon, says:

"This man is suffering from partial loss of sight of both eyes, probably from amaurosis. The eyes are inflamed slightly; pupils dilated and insensible to the light; can distinguish objects with great difficulty. He is incapacitated for performing manual labor."

As will be seen, the loss of sight caused the fall which resulted in insanity and finally the death of the soldier. It seems hardly necessary to assert that but for the loss of sight, as the physicians say, while in the service in the line of duty, the soldier would have lived many years longer, and would probably never have sustained the injuries that he received in the fall, and which in its result occasioned his death. The fact that the Government granted him a pension, and increased it from time to time under the rigid rules of the Pension Office, would be an estoppel on the claim that the Government was not liable, and that his injuries did not arise in the service while in the line of duty. We hardly think it worth while to be technical with the soldier who first served with credit five years in the most trying time of our history, and whose widow now asks the small pension at the hands of the Government.

The claim for the minor child, Ulysses Chipman, is perhaps not worth considering at this time, unless arrears be granted. The minor would only be entitled to $6 or $8 without the passage of this act, at most, being now nearly 16 years of age.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption and passage of the accompanying substituted bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

C. A. CILLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4856) granting a pension to Bvt. Col. C. A. Cilley, of North Carolina.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place the name of C. A. Cilley, of North Carolina, late a major and assistant adjutant-general of United States Volunteers, and brevet colonel of United States Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. J. S. WISE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 4856):

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 4856, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following report:

There seems to be some technical trouble in procuring medical certificates as to the disabilities of Colonel Cilley, such as are required by the Pension Office, but a careful examination of the papers filed by him satisfies us that his present diseased and enfeebled condition is the result of service and exposure in the Army, and we recommend the passage of the bill.

Colonel Cilley was a gallant officer, and is an honorable man. He avers most solemnly that his diseased condition is the result of his exposure and service, and his contention is fortified by the proofs filed.

LENOIR, N. C., February 15, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: This is to certify that I have personally known Col. Clinton A. Cilley since 1866, during which time he has been my patient. About ten years since he applied for treatment for neuralgia, and I advised the removal of several decayed teeth which seemed to be the irritating cause of the trouble. Their removal gave only temporary relief, and his malady, "progressive locomotor ataxia," has continued until his whole system seems a perfect wreck. He has tried every remedy advised by the very best physicians, has spent several months at the hot springs in Arkansas, with the hope of obtaining relief, all to no purpose.

I am satisfied that his disease was caused by exposure during the war, and as a soldier of the United States he should have a pension, and I hope the Committee on Invalid Pensions will recommend it.

Very respectfully,

J. MASON SPAINHOUR, D. D. S.

Hon. R. B. VANCE,
Washington, D. C.

FEBRUARY 18, 1884.

I certify that I have known personally Col. C. A. Cilley for a number of years (say seven), and that during almost the entire period he has been an invalid, losing from year to year his physical strength. He has, in my opinion, what is technically termed progressive ataxia, and is totally incapacitated for performing any manual or physical labor whatever. The foregoing is submitted by me, a practicing physician of this (Caldwell) county, North Carolina.

LENOIR, N. C., February 18, 1884.

I have known Col. C. A. Cilley as a sufferer from neuralgia for a number of years. Part of the time he has been under my treatment for neuralgia in its local forms, affecting the lumbar region, the course of the sciatic nerve, and lower extremities; and also in its more general form of neurasthenia. He has failed to derive permanent benefit from treatment and also a course at Hot Springs, Ark. The nerves of sensation are not only affected, but the motor nerves, especially of the lower extremities, are so seriously affected that he walks with difficulty. He has been so seriously affected as to prevent his practicing his profession; and, in my opinion, he ought not to try to do so now.

M. E. SHELL,
Clerk of Caldwell County.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
County of Caldwell:

This day came before me, an acting magistrate for the county aforesaid, A. A. Scroggs, M. D., and made oath, in due form of law, that he has been well acquainted with Col. Clinton A. Cilley, late of the Federal Army, ever since shortly after the surrender; has been his family physician and his own medical adviser for over fifteen years.

Like many others, Colonel Cilley came out of the war in apparent health; for a season this continued, when, notwithstanding his uniformly temperate life and correct habits, a series of what was adjudged a kind of nervo-rheumatic pain, exceedingly untractable and severe, developed in his system, whose persistence, in spite of treatment, both hygienic and medicinal, pointed with almost unmistakable evidence to the privations and exposures of army life as the primary source of a shocked and diseased nervous system, now unfitting him for the labors and successful prosecution of the duties of his profession, and constantly threatening him with still greater disabilities.

This affiant further certifies that he has no claim or interest whatever in making this affidavit.

A. A. SCROGGS, M. D.

Sworn to and subscribed on this 20th day of February, A. D. 1884, before me.

Clerk of Caldwell County.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington D. C., February 20, 1884.

SIR: In response to the personal request of Hon. R. B. VANCE relative to your claim for invalid pension, you are informed that the claim awaits the testimony indicated by the marked paragraphs of the accompanying circular letters. When the testimony herein called for is furnished the claim will receive prompt attention.

Very respectfully,

O. P. G. CLARKE,
Acting Commissioner.

CLINTON A. CILLEY,
Lenoir, Caldwell County, North Carolina.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1884.

SIR: In the claim for invalid pension No. 445384, of Clinton A. Cilley, lieutenant of Company C, Second Regiment Minnesota Volunteers, the testimony indicated in paragraph No. — should be furnished.

1. The affidavit of the family physician (or other competent testimony), which should show what the claimant's physical condition was at and prior to enlistment, especially whether he was free from locomotor ataxia.

2. The testimony of all the physicians who have attended him since the date of his discharge from the service, showing explicitly the history and degree of the disability from alleged locomotor ataxia during each year, the dates and duration of all treatment administered, and a full description of the disability in all its phases.

It is especially important that the physician who first attended the claimant after his discharge from the service should state the date at which his attendance commenced and his condition at that time, especially if he suffered from locomotor ataxia. (The affidavit should be, as far as practicable, in the language and handwriting of the physician.)

3. If the claimant can not furnish the medical testimony indicated in paragraph No. 2, he should state the fact and reasons under oath, and there should be furnished that of persons by whom he was employed, fellow-workmen, or neighbors, showing what his physical condition was at the date of their acquaintance, and what it has been each year since to the present time, and especially to what extent he has been incapacitated for obtaining subsistence by manual labor in consequence of locomotor ataxia.

The statement of the witness in regard to the manner in which the claimant was affected should be full and definite, and they should show how they obtained a knowledge of the facts to which they testify.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

CLINTON A. CILLEY,
Lenoir, Caldwell County, N. C.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
February 20, 1884.

SIR: In the claim for original invalid pension No. 445384, of Clinton A. Cilley, the testimony indicated in paragraph No. — should be furnished.

1. The affidavit of a commissioned officer or first sergeant of claimant's company, setting forth when, where, and under what circumstances the alleged locomotor ataxia was contracted.

2. The affidavit of the surgeon, of assistant surgeon, of claimant's regiment as to treatment for locomotor ataxia while in the service. It is desirable that the description of the disability should be, as far as practicable, in the handwriting of the surgeon.

The following names and addresses of officers of the claimant's company and medical officers of his regiment are given, with the view of assisting him in furnishing the required evidence:

Reg. Surg. B. H. Bingham, lives at Oshkosh, Wis.
Reg. Surg. Moody C. Tallman, lives at Oshkosh, Wis.
Hospital Steward J. V. Smith, lives in Pepin County, Wisconsin.
Asst. Reg. Surg. J. L. Armington, lives at Cannon River Falls, Minn.
Asst. Reg. Surg. Otis Ayers, lives at Le Sueur, Minn.
Asst. Reg. Surg. William Brown, lives at Chicago, Ill.
Capt. U. S. Baily, lives in Jasper County, Minnesota.
Lieut. H. K. Coure, lives at Waverly, Iowa.
Lieut. Jules Capon, lives at Wabasha, Minn.
Lieut. Mathias Thoney, lives at Glencoe, Minn.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

CLINTON A. CILLEY,
Lenoir, Caldwell County, North Carolina.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
February 20, 1884.

SIR: In every claim to invalid pension it is necessary that the following information should be furnished by the claimant if it does not appear in his declaration:

1. He should state under oath the nature and locality of the wound or injury or the name or nature of the disease for which pension is claimed.
2. He should state under oath when and where the alleged locomotor ataxia was contracted and the circumstances of the origin of each.
3. He should state under oath whether he has been in the military or naval service since ——— —, 18—.
4. He should state without oath the names or numbers and the localities of all hospitals (whether regimental, brigade, division, corps, post, or general hospital) in which he was treated while in the service, giving, as nearly as possible, the dates of treatment in each. If he was not treated in the service he should state that fact.
5. His post-office address (and in cities the street and number of his residence should be stated without oath).

In the claim No. 445384, of Mr. Clinton A. Cilley, the information indicated by paragraph No. 2 has not been furnished and should be supplied.

Very respectfully,

WM. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

CLINTON A. CILLEY,
Lenoir, Caldwell County, North Carolina.

Mr. CRISP. I wish to get some information about this case from the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], who appears to have introduced the bill.

Mr. VANCE. I shall very gladly answer any question of the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. As I understand the report, this soldier was not affected in any way by disease at the time of his discharge?

Mr. VANCE. The testimony of the surgeons is that when discharged he was not apparently diseased, but the disease from which he is now suffering began to develop immediately after his discharge, and they testify that they believe from their scientific knowledge that the disease originated in exposure during the war.

Mr. CRISP. As I understand the report, there is in this case no evidence of any army surgeon at all. When the gentleman speaks of the "testimony of the surgeons," I suppose he means the family physician and others at home. If I have understood the report correctly, there is no evidence of any disease for two years after the war—two years after the man's discharge; and then he became subject to neuralgia. I do not understand there is any evidence that he contracted this neuralgia in the military service of his country.

I believe it is stated in a certificate of one of the physicians that he might have done so. But I submit that nothing in the character of the affliction under which this man suffers connects it necessarily with his service in the Army. As we are aware, neuralgia is as often found in persons who never have been exposed as in those who have been. I submit that without some other evidence to satisfy this Committee of the Whole that the disease in this case was contracted in the service we should not (however much we may sympathize with the applicant) put him on the pension-roll.

My object in addressing my inquiry to the gentleman from North Carolina was that he might state any facts, if such existed, within his knowledge to justify the action now asked of us. I confess for myself that upon the reading of the report I have failed to discover anything authorizing the Committee of the Whole to believe that this gentleman contracted his ailments in the Army. This not appearing, I can not, unless something more be submitted, vote to put him on the pension-roll.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Chairman, the case of Colonel Cilley is somewhat peculiar. It appears from the report that he could not furnish in support of his application the testimony of the surgeons with whom he was associated in the war, because up to the time of his discharge the disease had not developed. Doctor Scroggs, Doctor Beall, and Doctor Spainhour certify that in their opinion the disability of Colonel Cilley was brought about by exposure in the Army. Doctor Scroggs is eminent in his profession. These other gentlemen are also men of character and scientific attainments. As I have said, his case is a peculiar one, and Colonel Cilley not being able to furnish the testimony of Army surgeons, produces before Congress the evidence of other surgeons who examined him and who were well acquainted with his condition immediately after the close of the war. Doctor Spainhour certifies that he has been acquainted with Colonel Cilley from the year 1866, about a year I suppose after his discharge.

Colonel Cilley was not able to make a case perfectly satisfactory to the Commissioner of Pensions. If he had been able to do so his application would not be here to-night. He is regarded as having been a very excellent officer during the war, and it is believed by those acquainted with him that his present disability (which has caused him to spend a great deal of money, he having made several trips to the Hot Springs in Arkansas) is the result of his service in behalf of his country.

He is not a native of North Carolina, but, as I believe, of Michigan. He removed into North Carolina after the war; he has a high character there. The people have perfect confidence in his statements. I think that under the circumstances his application to Congress for a pension ought to be granted.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the weakest cases which has ever been brought before the House for a pension. I am satisfied the House will pass it, because members come up here to pass bills. [Laughter.] That is the object of coming here. But I want to call their attention to this case. Ordinarily we never pass a bill in the House until it has been finally disposed of at the Pension Office. This case is pending in the Pension Office to-day. There has been no decision in that office in reference to it. In January or February of this year this applicant was informed of what was necessary to make out the proof in his case, even giving him the residence of the surgeon of his regiment, of his colonel, his lieutenant-colonel, and the other officers. He was given notice of where each one of these parties lived, and at the same time he was informed what was necessary to be proved in order to substantiate his claim for a pension. Instead of acting as pensioners ordinarily are required to do, he comes here to this Congress and asks us to relieve him of the duty of making out his case before the Pension Office.

Now, sir, I can see no more reason why we should require a private soldier to prove his case before the Pension Office than a colonel, or why one should be relieved and not the other. I believe this is the first case—it is certainly the first one in my recollection—where a claim has been brought here before it was disposed of at the Pension Office.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not know of any such rule as that stated by the gentleman from Alabama, and I think he is mistaken about the existence of any such rule. I do not see why a man should not bring his claim here at any time. I know of nothing to prohibit him from doing so.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My friend from Pennsylvania is not aware of the fact that the Invalid Pensions Committee, whether of the House or of the Senate, has adopted a rule where a pension is claimed under circumstances when it might be allowed under the general law, it must first go to the Pension Office.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And be disposed of.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Yes; rejected, or what has been done in this case, the claimant requested to furnish evidence which he can not obtain.

Mr. MATSON. That is the inflexible rule of our committee.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. And always has been.

Mr. MATSON. I had no knowledge of the fact in reference to this case before this evening. If it is pending there in the Pension Office, then I say this bill ought not to pass here to-night. Before being considered here it should be acted on finally there.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Allow me to make the suggestion that in fact all pension claims which have not been allowed are still pending in the Pension Office. Rejection is in no case final.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. That is true.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This case is still there, even if rejected, and the Commissioner will take it up when additional proof is furnished.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. There is no evidence that any final action has been taken on it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let me read a paragraph from the testimony of Commissioner Dudley on this very point.

The Clerk read as follows:

The COMMISSIONER. That is my idea. There is a rule of the Pension Office, based on an old law of 1831, which provides that upon the discovery of merit in a pension claim which under the rules of procedure and the laws must be rejected, the Commissioner is authorized to certify to Congress the case, with his recommendation that a special act be passed; and I have issued an order, which is in operation now in the office, by which all chiefs of divisions in which claims are adjudicated understand that where a rejected case possesses merit it may be certified in that way, and we have already certified to this session of Congress a large number of cases which in our judgment ought to receive consideration, and I am glad to see that the committees are acting on our recommendation without any further solicitation.

Mr. VANCE. I wish to say, with the permission of the gentleman from Alabama, one word further in regard to this matter. This applicant, Colonel Cilley, considered the letter of the Commissioner as being tantamount to a rejection of his claim, as he required him to furnish certain proof which he could not obtain. As he viewed the matter in that light, he then came directly to Congress for the relief which in my judgment he ought to have.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then in this case the applicant was not able to prove by the surgeon of his regiment or by any of the officers of his regiment, because the names and residences of these were sent to him by the Commissioner of Pensions in February last—he was not able to prove by any of them that he contracted this disease in the service; and therefore, not being able to make the proof required by law, he comes to Congress to get us to pass a bill for his relief, and relies upon the testimony of parties who were not with him in the service at all. Now, I submit to this House that if Colonel Cilley contracted his disease in the service, would not the evidence of the surgeons and officers or the men who served with him in the Army be of more effect and have greater weight than the evidence of these men in North Carolina who were fighting on the other side, and did not know anything about him?

Mr. PETERS. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. PETERS. The report in this case states that there was no apparent disease while he was in the service, and therefore he could not have been treated for it during his service in the Army; consequently none of the surgeons in the service with him at that time could have furnished evidence upon that point.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I have only one other remark to make in reply to that. The law requires a man when he makes his application for a pension to go before a board of surgeons appointed to represent the United States. This applicant has done no such thing. He has not gone before any such board of examining surgeons. We ought to have that evidence here—the evidence of surgeons who have inquired into and investigated his condition and reported upon it as to whether he contracted the disease in the service or not.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. How could Colonel Cilley go before this board of examiners until he had been notified or ordered to do so by the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Then, I have but to say in answer to that question, we had better wait until he does go before the board. Let us wait until he is ordered before the board. Let us not take the testimony of these home physicians. We all know how easy it is for a man's home physician to certify to his case and how unreliable such reports ordinarily are.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that this case is still pending in the office. I see that the last letter in reference to it is dated on the 20th of February, and the report was made on the 7th of March. It is a clear violation of the rule of the committee to act upon cases which are pending in the office and not rejected, although, as remarked by my friend from Indiana, when rejected they are still pending. But this case has not been acted upon yet by the Pension Office.

I suggest, therefore, that it be passed over until the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], within a reasonable time, can have action taken upon it in the office; and I suggest also that it be allowed to remain upon the Calendar in its present position. It will be in accordance with the rule adopted by the committee. I therefore ask unanimous consent that that course be taken with reference to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection this bill will be informally passed over, retaining its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

WILLIAM B. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5004) for the relief of William B. Smith.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who reported this bill is absent to-night. I ask therefore that it be laid aside informally, not to lose its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MISS MARY P. M'BLAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary P. MacBlair, daughter of Thomas Parkin MacBlair, late a purser in the United States Navy.

The report is as follows:

Mr. G. W. HEWITT, from the Committee on Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 2677:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Mary P. MacBlair, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

Miss Mary P. MacBlair is the daughter of the late Thomas P. MacBlair, who served in the Navy as purser from November 11, 1839, to his death, February 17, 1857. He died on board the Merrimac, after more than seventeen years of arduous and gallant service. Three children survived him, his wife having died one year previous to his death. His children were granted a pension, by special act, at the rate of $30 a month, from the father's death till May 12, 1870, when the youngest had reached the age of sixteen years. Purser MacBlair died poor, leaving his children nothing save a good name. One of the children is now dead. Of the two surviving, Alice is insane and is confined in an asylum; the other, Mary P., who seeks relief at the hands of Congress, made her own living until her health gave away under hard work, and her eyes began to fail.

Added to her blindness is serious spinal disease, and she is wholly incapable of earning a living. She has no home and no relatives able to aid her. At present she is in a charitable institution in Philadelphia, but will not be permitted to remain there longer than two or three months. Being as helpless now as when her father died, she needs the protecting care of the Government which that father so gallantly served, and your committee think her claims for a pension as strong now as they were when she was an infant. The general pension laws now give pensions to children of tender years because it is presumed that they are unable to support themselves until they are 16 years of age. But if from sickness or any physical or mental cause a soldier's child is unable to earn a living, the spirit of the law would require that the pension be continued.

Taking into consideration all the facts in this case, Miss MacBlair, as the worthy daughter of a brave man who lost his life while in his country's service, her misfortunes, and her utter incapacity to earn an honest living, your committee report the bill for her relief, with an amendment thereto, back to the House, and recommend that it pass.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions a question in reference to this case. Has this lady been unable to make her living ever since her father's death?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Oh, no. She drew a pension up to the time that she was 16 years old, and then for a number of years she supported herself. She was here for a part of the time working in one of the Departments, but her eyesight gave way and she contracted spinal disease, and is now totally incapacitated from performing any kind of labor for her own support.

Mr. STEELE. She is in a charity hospital now.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. She is temporarily in a charitable institution.

Mr. PETERS. Is it contemplated by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions to establish a precedent that whenever a person who has once been pensioned, as this lady was, becomes disabled by reason of age—a person who happens to be the child of an officer—that the Government shall take care of them?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No; that is not the proposition here at all.

Mr. PETERS. Is not that the proposition set forth by this bill?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No; it is not proposed to establish a precedent; but this bill simply follows a precedent which was set on last Friday evening, I believe, when you passed a bill to continue the pension for a soldier's son who was an idiot.

Mr. MORRILL. This is entirely a different case.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And that is the same reason we grant the pension in support of this woman. The law gives a pension to children of soldiers entitled to a pension until they reach the age of 16, because the law presumes that they are not able to take care of themselves until they arrive at that age.

Well, now, you passed a bill here last Friday evening—I do not remember all the circumstances—but I know it was the case of a lady, the daughter of an officer or a soldier, who became over 16 years of age and you continued the pension. And why? Because she was as helpless as she was in her infancy; and there was just as much reason to continue the pension after she became 16 years of age as there was before. It is just so in this case. Here was a child of a soldier, of a man who died in the service. The Government gave her a pension during her infancy and till she arrived at 16 years of age. And, why? Because her father was a soldier who died in the service leaving her an infant, helpless and not having the capacity to support herself. Now we present the same child that the Government gave that pension to, in the same physical condition, incapacitated to support herself as she was then; and we say she falls not within the letter but within the spirit of the law.

Mr. PETERS. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the distinction there is between this case and the case to which he refers. Pensions have been granted by this House and by other Houses to certain parties who have remained disabled, or, in other words, have remained infants after the age of 16 years; who never became able to support themselves. The disability of infancy continued, although that age had been passed. But that is not the case here.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I beg the gentleman's pardon, it is not a case of the disability of infancy.

Mr. PETERS. It is practically so.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. A person 21 years old is not in a condition of infancy. It is the incapacity of supporting themselves that continues, and not infancy, and that incapacity arises from some other cause than infancy. That is the reason why you granted the pension in the case referred to.

Mr. PETERS. The gentleman from Alabama does not seem to get the point I am seeking to make. All the bills that have been passed of that character thus far, according to my recollection, were cases in which the parties were just as entirely unable to support themselves after the age of 16 years as they were before that time. In other words, there had been no interregnum between the age of 16 years and the age, say, of 18 years in which the parties were able to support themselves. Here is an interregnum. The party after having arrived at the age of 16 years was supposed, under the presumption of the law, to be able to support herself, and therefore the pension was withheld; and she did support herself for a number of years; but afterward, by reason of some misfortune, she ceased to be able to support herself, and now she comes in and asks support from the Government. It is an entirely different case from those we have passed in this Congress heretofore.

Mr. MATSON. I desire to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS] there has been one case like this which passed this Congress, the case of the daughter of Colonel Murray, of the Pennsylvania Volunteers, where the daughter became an invalid. The case referred to by the gentleman from Kansas was from my own State; it was the case of one who was an imbecile from infancy. But, as I have said, there has been a case very similar to that reported by the gentleman from Alabama, the case of the daughter of Colonel Murray, of the Pennsylvania Volunteers, which has passed the House, and I think has passed the Senate, during this Congress.

Mr. PETERS. That case escaped my attention. I did not remember any precedent for the case now under consideration.

Mr. SLOCUM. I am very certain no gentleman on this floor who understands this case will raise any objection to granting this pension. This officer died leaving three daughters. They were granted pensions under the law of the Government of $20 a month each. One of them died soon after her father's death. To-day another one of those daughters is in one of the insane asylums of Pennsylvania. The remaining one came here to Washington while General Grant was President, and the officers of the Government knowing the circumstances of that young lady gave her a place here. She served here as long as her eye-sight permitted. Just as long as she was able to gain her living she served here faithfully. When her health failed she was obliged to give up her position.

She is to-day in a charitable institution, an institution supported by private charity. Grant there has been an interregnum, that there has been a lapse of time of a few months or years during which she has not received the pension, that is no reason why it should not be restored to her. I appeal to the gentleman from Kansas to withdraw his objection. This is a case which appeals to our sympathy and appeals to our sense of justice. This lady is worse situated to-day than she was when 15 or when 14 years of age, at which time she was entitled by the laws of the country to a pension. She is now infinitely worse off.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] a question. Has this case been rejected by the Pension Bureau?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It is not a case in which the Pension Bureau could grant a pension.

Mr. MORRILL. Then the case has not been there?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. No, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If it had been claimed this lady was entitled to a pension under any law of the United States the case would not have been brought here. If she is not entitled to a pension under the law, why send it to the Pension Office?

Mr. MORRILL. I only wish to call attention to the inconsistency of the gentleman from Alabama, who has stood here Friday night after Friday night opposing every pension bill presented from this side, and now we find him presenting himself a bill weaker than any we have passed, and because it is his ox that is gored he is calling out.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Alabamahas no special interest in this case.

Mr. MORRILL. I do protest against being compelled to stand up here night after night and defend against the gentleman from Alabama cases infinitely stronger than the case he now presents. The gentleman from Alabama either ought to cease his opposition to our bills or withdraw bills of this character introduced by himself.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kansas that if he wants to punish the gentleman from Alabama I beg he will not do it over a Pennsylvania case.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that I shall vote heartily for this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I did not know I had been opposing all the pension cases that came up here. That is rather news to me, and I think it is news to this House. I have simply been occasionally calling attention to cases, but I have not been resisting them. I did resist one a while ago, one which I think ought to have been resisted. But you have never presented a meritorious case here for any soldier from any part of the country which I have not supported.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUK. I have noticed that the gentleman from Alabama has constantly been in the habit of criticising the reports made in these pension cases because they did not set out all the testimony. Now I notice that this report is lacking in that very respect; yet I am going to vote for this bill.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I believe I did criticise, the other evening, a report of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] in which he referred to what a surgeon said concerning the disability that was contracted in the service. My criticism was that we could have told better what was right in that case if the report had set out exactly what the surgeon really said.

Mr. HOUK. And so we could better tell about this case if the gentleman from Alabama had set out in his report all the testimony.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I think so; it is probably true in regard to this case.

Mr. HOUK. I am going to vote for the bill myself.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If the committe is ready to vote on this question I will not detain it a moment.

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. RANDALL (to Mr. BROWNE). No; go on and say what you want to say.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. This case is not without precedents. Such cases have repeatedly passed the Congress of the United States within the last few years; I say, repeatedly.

Now, to state the matter tersely, here is the case of a child of a deceased soldier of the United States. That child has now to be supported by charity, either by private charity, or by the charity of some municipality, or by the Government. Under the general laws of the United States this claimant, as has been well said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEWITT], was entitled to a pension up to 16 years of age, because the presumption of the law is that up to that age the child is incapable of supporting itself. It is true that in this case that disability is not shown to have continued immediately beyond the arrival of the child at the age of 16 years. As the gentleman from Kansas well says, there is an interregnum.

But subsequently, after she had made a gallant struggle to maintain herself, the condition which she was in at 16 years of age and before returned to her. The practical question presented to this committee is, will the Congress of the United States, will the people of the United States allow the dependent son or daughter or widow of a soldier who died in the service of his country to become a subject of charity? [Applause.]

That is the practical question. Shall we send her to a poor-house in a city to be maintained, or to a poor-asylum in the county to be maintained? If we do that, the cost of the maintenance will come from the pockets of the people, from the treasure of the people. Shall we allow the people in a particular locality to maintain this woman? Will we remit the case to the town, city, county, or State, or will we do what we ought to do in all cases like this, and say that they are wards of the nation, and we will not merely support them as mendicants, but we will assign them to honorable positions upon the pension-rolls of the country? And we will do it because we regard the memory of the parent who laid down his life in his country's service. If we have made no such precedent, then let us make one to-night. [Applause.]

Mr. PETERS. I want to say just one word, as I made the objection in the first place to this bill. My object in making that objection has been accomplished. It was this: to emphasize this precedent so that we might stand by it in future. That was my object in making the inquiry I did. I believe in this precedent, whether the House has ever made it before or not, and I am ready to make it to-night. But I want to emphasize it so that in future it can be pointed to, not merely in the case of a soldier who died before the last war, but in the case of the family of every soldier who was connected with the last war.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Because this case will be made a precedent I think the attention of the Committee of the Whole ought to be directed to just what it means. If it would not be made a precedent, and upon it hereafter thousands of such cases go through Congress, then I should have nothing to say.

If we are ready to take the position indicated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], that the daughters and sons of soldiers who at any time in their lives after they have passed the age of sixteen years become dependent shall be placed on the pension-roll, then of course we are prepared to establish this precedent. I know very well that this bill and almost any other bill that comes up at these evening sessions will pass. Perhaps, taken by itself, this bill ought to pass; I am not going to express my judgment upon it. But to establish the principle that the daughter or son of any soldier who has died in the service, who may become dependent at any period of life after 16 years of age, shall be restored to the pension-rolls, is a precedent that I for one am not willing to make. I might be willing to go so far, and I think I would be willing to go so far, as to provide in a general law that any child of a soldier, drawing a pension up to 16 years of age, whose dependence at that age and afterward continues by reason of imbecility or insanity or any other such cause shall have the pension continued. I would be willing to pass a general law to cover all that class of cases.

But to go further and say that after a lapse of years, and when perhaps old age comes on, if dependence then returns the party shall be again placed on the pension-roll, is a step which I think we ought not to take, and if, as the gentleman last on the floor [Mr. PETERS] said, this case is to be taken as a precedent for all cases of the same class, then I am opposed to the passage of this bill.

Here is where precedents are made; and they become very often damning precedents. There is a proverb which says, "With one's own spurs and another man's horse, a man can outride the wind." So, when gentlemen come here to pass pension bills and establish precedents; to take not their own money, but the public money, which somebody must pay, and which in fact they must pay who earn little, there seems to be no limit to the amount that may be taken.

Now this specific case, regarded only as a specific case, I shall not oppose; but I do wish to enter my protest against this bill being taken as a precedent for any such purpose as that indicated—to establish the principle that after a lapse of time during which, on account of the independence of the party, the pension has ceased, he may, upon the return of dependence, be again placed upon the pension-roll. I see no other way to meet such cases than to leave them to the organized charities of the States, which are better managed than Government charities. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this bill is going to pass. I take the floor, not for the purpose of discussing the merits of the case, but to speak of a principle which seems to be presented here, and which I think it will be no loss of time to discuss. I refer to the question of precedents as affecting legislation. In my judgment, precedents are matters which legislators ought never to consider, except that when a principle has been recognized and acted upon we may learn from its practical effects the operation of that principle.

I am not surprised that this question as to precedents has been raised by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PETERS], because he has recently left the bench; and the judicial mind—the mind of the well-trained lawyer—is so peculiarly constituted that it can not take a step without referring to precedent. In fact, to a judge the last decision of a court is the law. But as legislators we are "a law unto ourselves." The principle which legislators must recognize is that "acts of parliament derogatory from the rights of subsequent parliaments bind not."

I have sat here by the hour and heard gentlemen cite precedents and precedents when questions of specific merit were involved. In this way I have seen hour after hour wasted. Why, gentlemen, it is our duty to change precedents. We are here to make laws, and though we may occasionally by a specific declaratory act say what the law is, our main duty as legislators is to change existing law and to make new laws. This is a principle that we ought to bear in mind for our government here, for it is one of vital importance with reference to progress in public affairs. Forgetfulness of this principle fills our RECORD page after page with matter which to us as legislators amounts to nothing.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Chairman, no member who has thus far spoken on this bill has failed to concede the meritorious character of the claim. The only opposition to the bill seems to arise from an apprehension that in the future some bill of a like character may be presented and passed.

A MEMBER. Some bill much weaker.

Mr. RANDALL. Some bill much weaker. But I beg that this meritorious measure shall not suffer by reason of any apprehension of that kind. When another bill of similar class comes here let us act upon it as I propose that we act on this—upon its merits.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Now, Mr. Chairman, before the vote is taken allow me one word upon the point just suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. That gentleman says, "Let us vote upon this bill on its merits, and when the next bill comes up let us do the same as to that." But may we not expect that when the next bill comes, whatever may be its merits, some gentlemen may say, "Oh, we have already passed a bill of that character and have established the precedent; therefore we ought to pass this." I believe the chairman of the committee reporting this bill [Mr. MATSON] has taken that ground distinctively—that a few evenings ago we established the precedent by putting such cases on the pension-roll.

Say what we will about precedents, they are all-powerful in the legislation of this House. We all know that. If I believed that this bill was to be taken as a precedent, was to be regarded as establishing the principle that when a person once entitled to a pension, but who for a time has been independent, shall again become dependent that person shall be restored to the pension-roll, I should feel bound to ask that the vote on this question be taken by a quorum of the House. But under the circumstances and with the protest which I have made, and accepting the assurance of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and others that this bill will not be taken as a precedent to put through other bills less meritorious, I shall not ask such a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT L. WILLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 709) granting a pension to Robert L. Willey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert L. Willey, late a corporal of Company H, First Regiment Heavy Artillery, Maine Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

Robert L. Willey enlisted July 25, 1862, in Company H, First Regiment Maine Heavy Artillery, and served continuously until March, 1865, when, because of his long and continuous services, he was granted leave of absence for twenty days to visit his home in Maine. On his way home he contracted a cold, and his furlough was extended for twenty days from March 28, 1865. On April 10, 1865, he was requested by the citizens of his town to aid in firing a salute in honor of the surrender of Lee, and while thus engaged, and without any fault on his part, he had his right arm so badly injured by the premature explosion of a cartridge that its amputation at shoulder-joint became necessary. These facts are shown by the records of the War Department. He was honorably discharged the service because of this disability August 30, 1865. His application for pension has been rejected by the Pension Office, to which he applied February 16, 1866, because the disability was not incurred in line of duty.

The faithful services of the claimant, his disqualification for the performance of manual labor, and consequent dependence upon his friends for support seem to your committee sufficient grounds to grant the relief asked for, and therefore return the bill and accompanying papers with the recommendation that the same do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions in regard to this claim.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Let it be read, as it relates to this case.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., April —, 1884.

SIR: Referring to the claim for invalid pension, No. 102684, of Robert L. Willey, late private of Company H, First Maine Heavy Artillery, I have the honor to state that it appears that the claimant, while at home in Maine on a sick-furlough, was engaged in firing a salute in honor of the surrender of Lee's army, and while so occupied the gun was prematurely discharged and his right arm blown off, necessitating amputation at the shoulder-joint, for which disability he was discharged from the United States service. The fact that the man was on sick-furlough and not acting under orders in firing the salute debars him from receiving pension under the general laws, but the equities of the case are such that I do not hesitate to recommend that a pension be granted him by a special act of Congress.

If it is possible to grant a pension with arrears from date of discharge, I think this is certainly a case in which such action should be taken, and I so recommend.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

The CHAIRMAN of the Committee on Invalid Pensions,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee for more than a moment in regard to this case, because I know the pressure of business and the necessity of proceeding with these pension cases as rapidly as possible. There are other deserving cases to be considered and I have no desire to unnecessarily delay them a single instant.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation, no objection having been made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I understand that, Mr. Chairman, but the bill fails to do full justice to the worthy claimant according to the testimony even of the Commissioner of Pensions. I feel it to be my duty, therefore, under the circumstances—and I will not recapitulate all the facts in the case—to move an amendment. This man served in the Army faithfully for more than three years, and was at home on sick-leave. If he had met with any disability because of his disease, there would have been no hesitation in granting him a pension from the date of that disability. Therefore, I move to add to the bill the words "as of the date of his discharge, August 30, 1865."

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will not do that, as it will provoke discussion.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I have no desire to provoke discussion.

Mr. MATSON. I had the letter read not for the purpose of indorsing the proposition to give this man arrears of pensions. I think the amendment ought not to pass.

Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire. In this case we think we have done what is right by reporting a bill to put this man on the pension-roll from the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. COSGROVE. I make the point of order that the bill has been laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BOUTELLE. For fear of imperiling the passage of this bill, I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

SALOME ANN WALKER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3656) granting a pension to Mrs. Orrin Walker.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Orrin Walker, widow of Orrin Walker, late of Company K, Twentieth Maine Volunteers, subject to the laws regulating pensions.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out "Mrs. Orrin," and in lieu thereof insert "Salome Ann;" and amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Salome Ann Walker."

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Mr. OSSIAN RAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

Salome Ann Walker is the widow of Orrin Walker, late private Company K, Twentieth Regiment Maine Volunteers, who enlisted July 22, 1862, and served until July 14, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. He was pensioned from July 14, 1865, to September 3, 1877, at the rate of $8 per month, for a severe gunshot wound in the left thigh and perineum, which was increased to $10 per month from March 31, 1873, for additional disability from intermittent fever.

The soldier died June 3, 1882, and his widow made application for a pension after her husband's death; but the Pension Office rejected her claim on the ground that the direct and immediate cause of the soldier's death was not the result of disability contracted in the service.

The soldier was wounded by a minie-ball at Gettysburg, in the left thigh, it being flexed at the time. The bullet entered the upper and inner fleshy part of left thigh, passed upward and backward, wounding scrotum and perineum, and passed out on right side of anus, causing a large cicatrix along the whole track, adhesion of abductor muscles of thigh, and much weakness, numbness, and pain. This is the account of the deceased soldier's condition as given by examining surgeon, Dr. F. H. Brown, of Paris, Me., in his certificate of June 19, 1866.

The history of the case is, briefly, that from the time of his discharge to his death in 1882 Walker grew worse from year to year, the latter part of the time having become weak and emaciated. The immediate cause of his death, after only six days' illness therefrom, is alleged to be "subacute inflammation of the stomach, with severe constriction of the upper bowel." But your committee are fully satisfied this sudden fatal result was mainly attributable to his diseased and feeble condition, caused by his severe wound and the hardships of his army life.

The widow is an old lady, without any property, and is in a very destitute condition.

Believing it is altogether more probable than otherwise that her husband would have recovered from the stomach and bowel trouble from which he was suffering at the time of his decease had he been otherwise sound, and that he could have survived the disabilities he contracted while in the service but a few months, we unanimously report in favor of the passage of the bill for her relief, with an amendment striking out the words "Mrs. Orrin" in the title and in the fourth line of the bill, and inserting therein instead the words "Salome Ann."

The amendments were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES M'MANUS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2908) granting a pension to James McManus.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of James McManus, late a private in Company B, Twelfth Regiment Illinois Volunteer Infantry, his pension to date from May 5, A. D. 1864, the date of his discharge from the United States Army.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out the following words:

"His pension to date from May 5, A. D. 1864, the date of his discharge from the United States Army."

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

From and after the passage of this act.

The report of the committee was read, as follows:

Mr. D. H. SUMNER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report:

Claimant enlisted August 1, 1861, and served as a private in Company B, Twelfth Illinois Volunteers, until May 5, 1864, when he was discharged on a certificate of disability.

He filed his application for a pension December 31, 1879, alleging that at the siege of Corinth, Miss., in the month of May, 1862, while lifting logs on the breastworks, he incurred a right inguinal hernia, and contracted disease of the heart and rheumatism.

James Harrington, a nurse in post hospital at Corinth, Miss., saw claimant in said hospital just after the last battle of Corinth, in October, 1862, when he was suffering from an ailment in his legs, and was unable to wait on himself, and affiant had to wait on him.

John Clark, a comrade of claimant, knew him in 1863, and remembers that he was sick and treated in the Overton Hospital in Memphis from some time in September to the middle of October, 1863.

B. F. Jones, of Poweshiek County, Iowa, states that claimant was in his charge at the poor-farm in and for said county about eighteen months during 1877 and 1878, during which time he was totally unable to make a living by manual labor, on account of the disabilities hereinbefore mentioned, for which he was frequently treated, but being of a chronic form, did not yield to medical skill.

Dr. A. J. Hare, of Milwaukee, Wis., states that he was late surgeon at the soldiers' home near that city, and that claimant was under his medical care at intervals for four years prior to October, 1882, for chronic valvular disease of the heart and chronic bronchitis, and that claimant also suffered from inguinal hernia and was totally disabled.

Dr. S. J. F. Miller, also a surgeon at said soldiers' home, states that the records of the hospital show that claimant was admitted to the home August 5, 1878, with disability as follows: Right inguinal hernia, valvular lesions in the heart, rheumatic trouble, and in December, 1880, he was troubled with chronic bronchitis, having a very severe cough, and was emaciated and very weak.

The reports from the Surgeon-General's Office show that claimant was under treatment in regimental hospital at different dates from May, 1862, to June 3, 1863, for intermittent fever, dysentery, and rheumatism.

August 24, 1881, claimant was examined by the Milwaukee board of examining surgeons, who reported that no disability existed.

June 13, 1881, claimant was examined by the board of examining surgeons at Fond du Lac, who reported the existence of inguinal hernia, emaciation, and debilitation.

Upon this testimony the examiner made a favorable submission for the allowance of a pension with the degree of disability as one-half from 1864 to 1874, as three-fourths from 1874 to 1878, and as a total from 1878 to the time of submission.

But the case was finally rejected upon the ground that no disability had existed since the time of discharge.

Your committee, however, believe that the mere opinion of the Milwaukee board of examining surgeons, upon one brief examination, ought not to stand against the certificate of disability given claimant at the time of his discharge, the testimony of comrades who knew of his sickness while in the service, the regimental hospital records showing the treatment for over a year, the keeper of the poor-house in Iowa, who had him under treatment for eighteen months, the two surgeons at the soldiers' home, near Milwaukee, who treated him for several years, the Fond du Lac board of examining surgeons, and finally the opinion of the pension examiner, who submitted the case for approval upon the evidence.

Wherefore we report favorably, recommend the passage of the bill, and ask that said committee be discharged from its further consideration; provided, however, that said bill be amended by striking out the words "his pension to date from May 5, A. D. 1864, the date of his discharge from the United States Army," and adding to said bill the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I wish to call attention to the fact that the claimant, August 24, 1881, was examined by a board of surgeons, who returned there was no disability, although a board, June 13, 1881, reported there was. It seems to me the last board which reported no disability should have more weight than the first one.

Mr. MATSON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that this bill gives the man no rating at all. He will still have to be examined to see what rate of disability would be allowed him, which would depend, of course, upon his condition. It can do no harm, therefore, to pass it in this form.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. It seems to me that he should not be put upon the roll unless there is some disability shown. However, I will not make any objection, though we ought to know the disability.

Mr. MORRILL. That will be established by the rating of the board.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

AZZUR W. READER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Azzur W. Reader.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Azzur W. Reader, late a carpenter's mate in the United States Navy, and pay him a pension from the 1st day of September, A. D. 1865, being the date he was discharged from the service of the United States.

The report is as follows:

Mr. D. H. SUMNER from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 3466:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Azzur W. Reader, having had said bill under consideration, submit the following statement of facts:

Claimant enlisted March 22, 1865, as carpenter's mate on the United States steamer Kate, and was honorably discharged September 1, 1865, and filed his application June 10, 1879, for pension on account of injury near the spine, received on or about June 15, 1865, on the Mississippi River, between Memphis and Vicksburg, caused by arising from scrubbing his hammock, in answer to call to "swing hammocks," and striking the under side of the muzzle of the bow-gun with force sufficient to prostrate him, and to prevent his rising without assistance; which injury produced hernia and resulted in total disability, the bruise having been so great as to produce slight hemorrhage of his right kidney and blood in his urine.

It further appears that claimant returned to his home in Fond du Lac, Wis., immediately after his discharge September 1, 1865; was in very poor physical condition and confined to his house for six months or more; was treated by Dr. Smead (since deceased), who informed him that he was about to have a breach or rupture, which fully developed as soon as he tried to get around; and that claimant did not know what his injury would result in until he was examined by Dr. Smead a few days after his arrival home.

Frederick A. Meyer, who was in the service with the claimant, corroborates claimant's declaration as to how the injury was received and as to the time and the manner as alleged.

S. A. Reader, also in the service with the claimant, corroborates the above, and says he was detailed by the officer in command to wait upon claimant.

Thomas W. Pate, a pilot on said steamer, also fully substantiates the foregoing statements.

George W. Rogers, late acting lieutenant, commanding said steamer, states that when he took command of the vessel named, claimant was off duty, and confined to his hammock in consequence of injuries received on board, and that claimant appeared to affiant to be badly hurt, and that he detailed one of the crew to wait upon claimant.

N. H. McGuire, late acting assistant surgeon on said steamer, does not remember treatment of claimant, but does remember, on receiving an order to discharge about one-half of crew (addressed to all surgeons in Mississippi squadron), that he placed claimant's name among the number because Lieut. George W. Rogers, the commander, requested it on account of claimant's disability.

Mrs. S. A. Lilleston says that she boarded with wife of claimant in summer of 1865; that in the early spring of that year claimant and two youngest sons went into the Navy; that some time in June or July, 1865, claimant's son wrote home that his father had received an injury; that affiant continued to board with claimant's wife, and that on his return from the Navy, in the fall of that year, claimant was poor in flesh and very feeble, and that his condition was attributed to the injury referred to, which, as affiant was informed and believed, resulted in an aggravated case of hernia.

Charles W. Brown, a neighbor of claimant, says that claimant came home in late summer or early fall of 1865, and complained of back or lower part of spine; likewise of very severe cutting pains in front at bottom of bowels; that a short time after and during the same season claimant showed him a hernia, and that claimant has been entirely incapacitated for labor since that time.

C. B. Bartlett, Henry Shattuck, and Azro B. Taylor, all neighbors of claimant, say that when he returned home from the service he was very poor in flesh, pale, and emaciated, and that they learned he was suffering from a rupture or hernia brought on by an injury received in the service.

Col. C. K. Pier, late of the Union Army, states that claimant's disability for labor is total, and believes claimant's statements entitled to full credence.

Dr. T. F. Mayhan, present mayor of the city of Fond du Lac, Wis., treated claimant, soon after his discharge and return to his home, for inguinal hernia of the right side, and has treated and examined him from time to time since June, 1866, to the present time, and has always found him suffering from the same malady.

Drs. F. A. Bishop, S. S. Bowers, and A. H. Dorris, all of said city of Fond du Lac, have all treated and examined the claimant at different times between the time of his discharge from the service and the present time, and have found him afflicted as before stated, and all agree that his disability for performing manual labor is total.

The evidence is clear that claimant was sound when he enlisted, so far as appeared or could be known, and that when he returned from the service he had the disability as alleged in his claim for a pension.

The claim for pension was rejected because there is no hospital record of t reatment, and upon the opinion of the pension medical examiner that the injury received was not sufficient to cause the result complained of and established, and from that he infers that the trouble existed before enlistment.

In the opinion of your committee the proofs are ample to establish the right of the claimant to a pension, and it is held that the conclusion of the Pension Office is based upon a technical rule, from the effect of which the claimant ought to be relieved.

Wherefore, we report favorably, recommend the passage of the bill, and ask that said commitee be discharged from its further consideration; provided, however, that said bill be amended by striking out the words "from the first day of September, anno Domini eighteen hundred and sixty-five, being the date he was discharged from the service of the United States," and adding to said bill the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendments proposed by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORLANDO CULVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5215) granting a pension to Orlando Culver.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Orlando Culver, late a corporal of Company F, Fifth Wisconsin Volunteers.

The report is as follows:

Mr. D. H. SUMNER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report (to accompany bill H. R. 5215):

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5215) granting a pension to Orlando Culver, having had said bill under consideration, submit the following statement of facts:

Claimant enlisted May 10, 1861, and served until March 6, 1862, when he was honorably discharged, having contracted rheumatism and neuralgia in October, 1861, when in the line of duty, by exposure and hard service, when he was sent to hospital, where he remained until discharged.

He applied for pension May 21, 1880, and his claim was rejected March 21, 1883, upon the ground that the record made by the surgeon who examined him for his discharge showed that the disability existed before enlistment, and that the Milwaukee medical examining board reported against him upon the ground that the members thereof could not find that he was afflicted as claimed.

Notwithstanding the rejection of this claim by the Department, the Department examiner, Vivian Brent, recommended its allowance in the following words:

"From my examination of all the evidence submitted in this case, I am of the opinion that the claim should be admitted for neuralgia and rheumatism. I think that claimant has been disabled for performing manual labor during the years since his discharge."

The examiner then makes a statement of the time, from 1862 to 1882, inclusive. Then, in a separate statement, he further says:

"Notwithstanding the statement in the certificate of disability in this case as to the prior existence of rheumatism, I think the claim should be admitted, in view of the strong evidence of credible witnesses as to prior soundness and freedom from disability at and prior to enlistment."

The disability of the claimant, not only from the time of discharge, 1862 to 1882, inclusive, but at the present time, is established by Dr. Hugo Philler, the local United States medical examiner, Dr. Albert Kendrick, Dr. Albert M. Warner, Dr. V. L. Moore, Dr. J. E. Bacon, so far as medical evidence is concerned; and by Capt. I. M. Bean, now collector of internal revenue at Milwaukee, in whose company claimant served; John J. Gibbs, A. C. Hawes, John Ross, and George Klock, comrades and neighbors of claimant, who have known him since boyhood.

The disability is rated at $4 per month by all the foregoing physicians and others.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill with the following amendment: Add at the end of the bill the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MATHEW O. REGAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1631) to increase the pension of Mathew O. Regan.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Mathew O. Regan, late of Company E, Third Regiment United States Artillery, at the rate of $24 per month, according to the provisions of the act increasing pensions, approved June 18, 1874, instead of $18 per month, which he now receives.

The report is as follows:

Mr. D. H. SUMNER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 1631:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1631) granting a pension to Matthew O. Regan, having had said bill under consideration, submit the following statements of facts:

Claimant is now receiving a pension of $18 per month, and has been since June 8, 1872, for amputation of the right forearm two and a half inches below the elbow.

The claim is that the amputation is so near to the elbow-joint that it is not possible to either use the stump or to attach to it any artificial help, so that the disability is equal to an amputation above the elbow-joint, for which he would receive the sum asked for, $24 per month.

Your committee is of the opinion that the disability is equal to an ordinary amputation above the elbow, and therefore report favorably, recommend the passage of the bill, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration; provided, however, that said bill be amended by adding thereto the following words: "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, there is evidently a mistake of law in this bill. This man is receiving $24 now under the law. This appears to have been a copy of a bill introduced at a time when he was receiving under the law but $18 per month, and the effort was then made to increase it to $24 in consequence of the fact that his disability is equal to the loss of an arm above the elbow. Since then, however, the law has been changed so that he would draw the pension which this bill proposes now to grant him. The purpose of the bill, as set forth plainly in the report, is to give him the same pension as if his arm had been taken off above the elbow. That is evident from the report itself.

I therefore move to strike out, in line 6 of the bill, the words "twenty-four," and insert in lieu thereof "thirty;" so that it will read: "thirty dollars per month."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SUMNER, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment to this bill in addition to the amendment recommended by the committee in the report, which is as follows: That the same be amended by striking out "twenty-four," in line 6, and inserting "thirty." In line 8, strike out "June 18, 1874," and insert in lieu thereof "March 3, 1883;" and also strike out, in line 9, the words "eighteen dollars per month," and insert in lieu thereof the words "twenty-four dollars per month." I therefore move that the original report be so amended.

Mr. MATSON. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendment proposed by the committee, to add at the end of the bill the words "from and after the passage of this act," was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIDNEY B. TULLAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5213) to restore Sidney B. Tullor to the pension-roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to and place on the pension-roll the name of Sidney B. Tullor, late first lieutenant of Company B, Sixteenth Wisconsin Infantry, and to pay him at the same rate, $12 dollars per month, that he received before, and to be paid from the time he was suspended from said roll.

The following amendments were reported by the committee:

In line 5, strike out "Tullor" and insert "Tullar."

Amend the title so as to read:

A bill to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5213) to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll, having had said bill under consideration, submit the following statement of facts:

The claimant is now and has been since the year 1850 a resident of the village of East Troy, Walworth County, Wisconsin, and was 69 years of age August 22, 1883.

He enlisted in September, 1861, and received a commission as first lieutenant Company B, Sixteenth Wisconsin Infantry, November 14 of the same year, and was in active service and in good health until about the 1st of April, 1862, when he was taken with a very severe attack of diarrhea near Pittsburg Landing, but as it was apparent that a battle must soon be fought, and being in command of his company, he remained on duty in camp until the battle of Shiloh was fought, April 6, 1862, when, although sick and very weak from his attack of diarrhea, he went into that battle with his company, and, under the excitement of the conflict, kept up and remained on duty during the three days of that memorable battle.

As soon as the battle was over he was also taken with what is commonly called camp fever and placed in hospital, where he remained under constant medical treatment, being very sick, until about the 1st of June, 1862, when, although not able to walk, and being reduced almost to a skeleton, and still suffering from both diseases mentioned, he was taken home by a special detail for that purpose.

The fever was communicated to five of the members of his family, who were all very sick, and one of them died within seven weeks after his return. In the latter part of July, 1862, the fever left the claimant, but about the same time the diarrhea assumed the chronic form, from which he has never recovered. The claimant had never been sick and had never taken medicine up to the time he was attacked with these diseases in the Army.

When the claimant was sent home from the hospital he was honorably discharged upon a certificate of disability. He applied for and in 1873 received a pension of $12 per month, with arrears from the time of his discharge, for chronic diarrhea, his general condition being as follows:

About two years after his discharge he recovered to such an extent as to be able to walk and ride about and attend to light business not requiring much exertion a part of the time, but was frequently confined to his house for days at a time and not able to do anything on account of that disease and its effects. He always bloats after eating, and any exercise or work that necessitates standing or walking for any considerable length of time causes his feet and legs to swell. These conditions have continued to and exist at the present time. During this period of disability he has been treated by and prescribed for by Drs. Charles L. Stoddard, formerly of said village of East Troy, but now of La Crosse, Wis.; C. S. Blanchard and D. W. Rector and P. O. Griste, of said village of East Troy; E. B. Wolcott, of Milwaukee (now deceased), and Dr. Ellsworth, of Elkhorn, Wis.

For some reason unknown to the claimant he was cited to appear and did appear in May, 1880, before the Milwaukee board of examining surgeons, and was examined as to the state of his disability. This board made an adverse report, and his pension stopped for a short time. The claimant not being satisfied with the result, and making complaint that injustice had been done him, he was notified to appear and did appear before the Madison board of examining surgeons, and was again examined as to the state of his disability in September, 1880. This board made a favorable report, and his pension was restored, with arrears. In September, 1882, claimant was notified to appear and did appear before one Alex. McC. Wilson, special examiner, and also before said Milwaukee board of examining surgeons, for further examination as to the state of his disability, upon which examination an adverse report was made and claimant's pension again stopped, the claimant being at this time 68 years of age.

Twelve of the citizens of the said village of East Troy, including Drs. Blanchard and Rector, appeared and testified before said special examiner. The effect of the testimony of these citizens fully sustained the foregoing statement of facts. Their testimony also fully establishes the fact that the claimant has been and still is a man of first-class standing and character in the community in which he lives, and that he has received and does receive from his neighbors and fellow-citizens their highest esteem and fullest confidence.

Wherefore, your committee report favorably, recommend the passage of the bill, and ask that said committee be discharged from its further consideration; provided, however, that said bill be amended by striking out the word "Tullor" in the title of the bill and substituting therefor the word "Tullar," and by striking out the word "Tullor" from the text of the bill and substituting therefor the word "Tullar."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, of Missouri, reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration pension bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report back sundry bills, some with and some without amendment.

BILLS PASSED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will first report those bills which are reported without amendment.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup;

A bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to Decatur Hamlin;

A bill (H. R. 5686) granting a pension to Sarah J. Chapman; and

A bill (H. R. 709) granting a pension to Robert L. Wiley.

The bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker, reported from the Committee of the Whole House without amendment, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Bills of the following titles were reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments; the amendments were severally concurred in, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough;

A bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair;

A bill (H. R. 2908) granting a pension to James McManus;

A bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Azzur W. Reader;

A bill (H. R. 5215) granting a pension to Orlando Culver; and

A bill (H. R. 1631) to increase the pension of Mathew O. Regan.

The bill (H. R. 4041) restoring the name of Zelica T. Dunlap to the pension-roll was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Zelica T. Dunlap."

The bill (H. R. 3656) granting a pension to Mrs. Orrin Walker, was reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendments.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Salome Ann Walker."

The bill (H. R. 5213) to restore Sidney B. Tullor to the pension-roll was reported from the Committee ot the Whole House with amendments.

The amendments were concurred in, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll."

Mr. MORRILL. I move to reconsider the several votes by which the bills have been passed, and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BAGLEY (at 9 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BAYNE: Resolutions of Post No. 3, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, relating to pensions, &c.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CARLETON: Resolutions of Albert Nye Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Michigan, relating to pensions, &c.—to the same committee.

By Mr. CANDLER: Petition of citizens of Milton County, and of citizens of Cherokee County, Georgia, for the passage of the Blair bill—severally to the Committee on Education.

Also, petition of citizens of Rabun County, Georgia, for the passage of the Blair bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. GARRISON: Petition of James W. Shely, for pay as a fireman—to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. HAMMOND: Petition of H. L. Culberson and others, of Fulton County, Georgia, in favor of Federal aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. JEFFORDS: Petition of Rev. W. F. Adams and others, citizens of Vicksburg, Miss., asking the passage of the Senate educational bill—to the same committee.

By Mr. KETCHAM: Petition for the relief of Charles W. Torrey—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MAYBURY: Petition of Herman Voss and others, of Detroit, Mich., in favor of the pending bills in the interest of labor—to the Committee on Labor.

By Mr. MILLIKEN: Petition of Francis Young and others, for pensions to soldiers who enlisted in the Aroostock War—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MONEY: Petition for national aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. NELSON: Resolution of the Republicans of Stevens County, Minnesota, in convention assembled, in favor of the Morrison tariff bill—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PETERS: Resolutions of Company I, Second Regiment Kansas State Militia, praying for the passage of H. R. 5980—to the Committee on the Militia.

By Mr. ROCKWELL: Petition of Business Men's Association of Springfield, Mass., for the passage of the bankrupt law now pending before Congress—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. T. G. SKINNER: Petition of J. B. Baum and 42 others, for educational aid—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. D. H. SUMNER: Petition of citizens of Fond du Lac, and of citizens of West Bend, Wis., relative to the judiciary of the United States Federal courts—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WOLFORD: Petition of citizens of Adair County, Kentucky, together with the certificate of a number of physicians as to his physical condition, asking for a pension for Milton Judd—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of citizens of said Adair County, for the improvement of the Cumberland River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 26, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ELLIS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw the call for the regular order for a few minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desires to call up a privileged matter.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask that the message from the Senate in relation to the naval appropriation bill be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the message of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, April 25, 1884.

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HALE, Mr. LOGAN, and Mr. BECK be the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and that the request of the Senate for a conference be complied with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as conferees on the part of the House the gentleman from New York, Mr. HUTCHINS, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. RANDALL, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. CALKINS.

ENSIGN L. K. REYNOLDS.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask consent to report from the Committee on Naval Affairs for present consideration a joint resolution (S. R. 26) granting permission to Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph from the Government of Austria. It is a unanimous report of the Committee on Naval Affairs. It is to authorize Ensign Reynolds to receive a medal for saving a dozen lives. He has gone off on the Greely relief expedition, but the good-will of Congress can follow him by telegraph and perhaps reach him at Halifax or some other place. I have tried several times to get consideration of this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That Ensign L. K. Reynolds, United States Navy, be, and he is hereby, granted permission to accept the decoration of the Royal and Imperial Order of Francis Joseph, awarded him by the Austrian Government in recognition of heroic conduct in saving the lives of the crew of the Austrian bark Olivo, November 24, 1879.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution which has been read?

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I must object, unless a very brief statement is allowed. I would do anything for this gallant officer. I am willing to vote the thanks of Congress to him, for he is a deserving young man. He can get more honor from the Government of the United States by our passing a resolution of thanks than he would receive from these ribbons and nonsense of this kind, which are utterly ridiculous in comparison with the approbation of the American people. I want to be heard two or three minutes upon it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not object to yielding to the gentleman two or three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Any other day will do as well.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope there will be no objection. I am willing to yield three or five minutes to my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. MORRISON. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. COX, of New York. I now yield three minutes to my colleague, or five minutes if he wants it.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I want ten minutes at least.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER. The objection is renewed by several members.

Mr. ROBINSON, of New York. I am glad of it.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I ask consent to take from the Speaker's table the message of the Senate upon the Post-Office appropriation bill for the purpose of acceding to the request of the Senate for a committee of conference.

The message of the Senate was then taken up, announcing that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, and asked for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PLUMB, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BECK.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House insist upon its disagreement upon the Senate amendments and consent to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the following as the conferees on the part of the House: Mr. TOWNSHEND, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HORR.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

SPANISH FERRY-BOAT NUESTRA SEÑORA DE REGLA.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration the first bill from the Senate on the Speaker's table. It is Senate bill No. 652, to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to make proper payment to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, bearing date December 10, 1883, in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla, her tackle, &c., illegally seized by forces of the United States in 1861, to the claimant and appellee therein named, or its legal representative, with interest from the date of said decree.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has been read?

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is a report I hope it will be read.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate bill now on the Speaker's table. If there is no objection the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will be permitted to make a statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. If there is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House on this subject, I should like to hear it read.

Mr. POLAND. This is the first bill which was sent to us from the Senate, I believe. Precisely the same bill has been reported by the Committee on the Judiciary of the House, I think the very first bill reported this session from that committee, and there is a report submitted by that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let that report be read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, the right to object being reserved.

The report (made by Mr. DORSHEIMER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2842) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York, in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla, respectfully submit the following additional report:

The committee find and report the following facts upon which this bill stands:

The steamer Nuestra de Regla was built in New York for the claimant, a railroad company in Cuba created by the laws of Spain. She was delivered to an agent of the claimant on the 6th of November, 1861, and sailed for Havana in command of a Spanish master. She was a side-wheel steamer of about 300 tons burden, built to run on a ferry between Havana and a terminus of the railroad company's railroad.

On her way down the coast she went into Port Royal, and while there the quartermaster of the United States at that port offered to purchase her for the use of the Government. The master declined to sell, as he had no authority. She was then, on the 29th of November, seized by Gen. Thomas W. Sherman, in command of the United States forces. In communicating the fact of the seizure to the Adjutant-General of the Army on the 2d of December the General said:

"If this steamer I have seized is confiscated she should be left here. She is just the thing we want, and admirably adapted for these waters and our purpose. She is new and exactly such a boat as they have at the Jersey City ferry in New York. Will carry 1,000 men and will not draw over six or seven feet."

No judicial proceedings were then instituted for her condemnation, but an arrangement was entered into between the Chief Quartermaster of the United States and the captain of the vessel, the substance of which was that the vessel was to be taken and used by the Government as a transport for troops, stores, and other things, and pay $200 a day for her use, but if the vessel should be confiscated the contract was to be void. Either party had a right to terminate the contract after ten days. This arrangement was made December 16, 1861.

The vessel was used by the Government under this arrangement until the 29th of January, 1862, when she was delivered to the flag-officer of the Navy in command at that station, but the vessel continued to be used as before till about the 1st of March, when she was sent to New York.

On the 9th of June, 1862, a libel of information in prize was filed in the district court of the southern district of New York by the United States in behalf of themselves and the naval captors in interest, and on the same day she was attached by the marshal of the United States and the usual monition was issued and served. The vessel was appraised by order of the court, and then, by order of the court, delivered to the Navy Department.

Then there followed some negotiation and correspondence between this Government and that of Spain in regard to the vessel, but no result was reached by these efforts. The information for libel went on in the district court, and it was decided that the claimants were entitled to restitution of the vessel, and a reference ordered to ascertain the damages. On the report of a commission the district court rendered a judgment fixing the damages at the large sum of $214,884. The United States appealed from the decree, and at the October term, 1872, of the Supreme Court it was decided "that the vessel was not lawful prize of war, or subject of capture, and that the claimant was entitled to indemnity for the losses sustained by the seizure and employment of the vessel." The court decided, however, that the damages allowed were excessive and improperly assessed, and so the case was remanded for further proceedings in the district court. The case is reported in seventeenth of Wallace, page 31.

Under this remand the case was again referred to a commission, and upon his report the district court assessed the claimant's damages at $308,932.38.

The United States again appealed to the Supreme Court, and the case was again decided by that court, October term, 1882. That court held again that the steamer was not lawful prize or subject of capture, and that the owner was entitled to fair indemnity for his losses sustained. But the court again held that the damages had been improperly assessed, and were too large.

Upon all the facts reported and appearing in the record the court decided that the claimant, for the value of the vessel and damages for the detention and delay, was entitled to have damages amounting to $65,000, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from the time of the order of restitution, June 20, 1863, and the case was remanded to the district court with directions to enter a judgment for the claimant on that basis. On this remand judgment was entered in the district court of the southern district of New York, as directed by the Supreme Court.

The committee have not deemed it necessary to recite all the circumstances and details of the history of this litigation, but give only the substantial facts and refer to the record and opinions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that the proceeding of the court is conclusive, and that the judgment ought to be paid. From the action of the court on the subject of interest it would apparently seem at first blush that there was no statutory authority fixing the rate of interest relating back to the time when the vessel was ordered to be redelivered, which I believe was in 1863; I am not certain as to the date. But even if the Supreme Court might properly pronounce such a judgment under the statute, I desire to say that I understand from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] that the statute fixes the rate of interest on final judgments at 5 per cent.

Mr. POLAND. I have the opinion of the Supreme Court here.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is sufficiently stated in the report of the committee. If, as I have suggested, the law fixes the rate of interest at 5 per cent., how can the Supreme Court properly go beyond the rate of interest so prescribed, and that, too, on the final judgment, not having relation back to a given date? I hope the gentleman from Georgia will call attention to that statute.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] asked me if there was any law authorizing interest on final judgments. I told him that there was a law since 1863, codified into section 1090 of the Revised Statutes, and that the rate of interest prescribed was 5 per cent. That relates to cases in which no interest is reserved by contract. I do not mean to say, however, that that would extend to the judgment of a court fixing the rate of interest at any particular rate, for that would depend entirely upon the judgment of the court. As I understand, we are now simply trying to provide money to pay the final judgment.

Therefore the question of statutory interest I submit does not come into consideration in this case. The difference of 1 per cent. ought not at any rate to raise any difficulty in the face of a judgment of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HOLMAN. This question of interest upon amounts found to be due by the Government is one of the most difficult questions with which we have to deal, and one of the most important. I trust the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND] will read the statute bearing on the question.

Mr. HAMMOND. I read section 1090 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 1090. In cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of the claimant, and the same is affirmed by the Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment as aforesaid, but no interest shall be allowed subsequent to the affirmance, unless presented for payment to the Secretary of the Treasury as aforesaid.

Then the next section is as follows:

SEC. 1091. No interest shall be allowed on any claim up to the time of the rendition of judgment thereon by the Court of Claims, unless upon a contract expressly stipulating for the payment of interest.

Now, what I meant to say was that when the Supreme Court pronounces a judgment for interest we are, I should think, concluded by that judgment; and when we pass a bill to make payment we must pay according to the terms of the judgment.

Mr. RANDALL. I agree fully with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that this is an important matter. I do not pretend to say what the law upon this question is; on a matter of that kind I would prefer to rely upon the judgment of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

But I will say that in my experience upon the Committee on Appropriations in connection with estimates from the courts or other authorities that send in statements of judgments to be met by appropriations no such estimate has included a separate item for the principal of the debt as required by the judgment and another item for the interest.

Mr. HAMMOND. The judgment here requires the payment of both.

Mr. POLAND. I have here a copy of the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case.

Mr. HOLMAN. We do not question that the decision is correctly stated in the report. I wish to call attention to the specific language of the statute, because our action upon this case is to be a precedent, and a very important one, for I know of no question that is pressing upon Congress at this time more earnestly than this question of interest. The language of the statute, as read by the gentleman from Georgia, is very explicit.

In cases where the judgment appealed from is in favor of the claimant—and the same is affirmed by the Supreme Court, interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. shall be allowed from the date of its presentation to the Secretary of the Treasury for payment.

That is just this case—

Now, I do not entertain a doubt that in the absence of evidence to the contrary it should be presumed that the claim was presented to the Secretary of the Treasury at the date of the rendition of the judgment; and interest should be computed from that date. I submit to my friend from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] that the Supreme Court of the United States, its attention having been called to this statute, could not have gone beyond its express provisions and limitations; and therefore this claim should draw interest from the date of the rendition of the judgment. I trust the gentleman will acquiesce in this view.

Mr. RANDALL. The point which I wished to make was that in cases of judgments carrying interest against the Government of the United States Congress should in some way be made immediately aware of the fact that interest is running against the Government. Otherwise a debt might be running upon interest while the money would be in the Treasury and could be promptly paid and interest thereon saved. I will illustrate by referring to the case of the Geneva award. About seven and a half million dollars of this money have been expended thus far. There is interest accumulating in favor of the fund, and this interest now aggregates, as I am advised, two and a half millions. In this way the interests of the United States may be suffering.

It is very important, therefore, that this matter of interest upon judgments against the United States should be made plain, and that officers of the Government should advise Congress promptly in relation to the existence of such judgments.

Mr. POLAND. The statute which the gentleman from Georgia has read has no application to this case. If there had been a judgment in the circuit court, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, the statute would have applied. But in this instance the district court rendered judgment for a very much larger sum than we now propose to pay. The Supreme Court reversed that judgment because the damages were assessed too high, and sent the case back for another trial. The district court then assessed the damages at a much larger sum than it had awarded the first time, but reported the items of the claim. The Supreme Court cut down the amount to $65,000, and said that the party should have judgment for this sum and 6 per cent. interest. The case does not come within the statute that my friend from Georgia has read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that in all cases partaking of the nature of a chancery proceeding the appellate court may pronounce final judgment upon the facts, and in some States this may be done without reference to the case being in the nature of a chancery proceeding. Here was an appeal from a large judgment; and the judgment was affirmed as to a given sum. The case stands upon the same footing as a case of remittitur, except that the Supreme Court in this instance passed judgment upon the facts as presented by the record. But the same principle is involved and the same result reached as in the case of an affirmance of a judgment on an appeal.

This case is covered certainly by the spirit of the statute, and almost by its letter. So that I must object to the precedent which would be set by this bill. This is the first instance in which the statute has been directly ignored——

Mr. POLAND. If my friend will look——

Mr. HOLMAN. So far as this action of the House is concerned; that is, within my recollection.

Mr. POLAND. There have been twenty.

Mr. HOLMAN. But they have not come to my knowledge. There may be such cases. But I can not consent to the establishing of such a precedent.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact——

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand the regular order of business. [Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. POLAND. I hope not.

Mr. SLOCUM. Yes, I do; as this will take up the whole day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana to object.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless the statutory provision touching interest is recognized I must object to the measure.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the gentleman from Indiana, and the gentleman from New York demands the regular order.

Mr. TUCKER. I wish to say——

The SPEAKER. This is no longer before the House.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, till Tuesday next.

To Mr. JONES, of Alabama, until May 10.

CLAIMS APPROPRIATION DEFICIENCY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplementary list of claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury under appropriations which are now exhausted; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INDIAN DEFICIENCIES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting supplementary estimates of the amount necessary to pay claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Department for services rendered and supplies furnished to the Indian service for the fiscal year of 1884 and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this day has been set apart for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign-carrying trade.

Mr. SLOCUM. Let the bill be read.

The bill and amendments were read.

Mr. SLOCUM. I ask for the reading of the report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SLOCUM, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, submitted the following report:

The Select Committee on Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, having had the subject under consideration, submit the following report:

In devising measures to revive the declining American merchant marine engaged in the foreign carrying trade, the first step to be taken is to remove all those burdens and annoyances imposed by legislation, which increase the cost of sailing the vessels we already have in this trade beyond the cost of sailing competing foreign vessels, not subject to such impositions. Obviously few persons will care to build or buy vessels to enter the foreign trade in free competition with British vessels so long as such vessels can not be sailed to as great advantage under the flag of the United States as under the British flag.

Until after 1852, when Great Britain, under the lead of her newly established board of trade, began to revise her merchant shipping acts in the interest of her merchant marine, her laws were similar to our own, and the vessels of both nations sailed under substantially the same conditions. From that time to the present it has been the policy of the English Government to remove every burden and extend every facility and encouragement to her merchant marine in the foreign trade, while the laws of the United States relating to our merchant marine in this trade remain substantially as they were enacted more than three-fourths of a century ago.

Your committee are of opinion that Congress would be derelict in its duty to a great national interest which is so intimately connected with the prosperity of the people in peace, and so essential to the nation's defense and safety in war, if it did not at once inaugurate measures looking to the modification of our shipping laws so as to make them as favorable to an American vessel sailing under the Stars and Stripes as are the laws of the United Kingdom to an English vessel sailing under the British flag.

The laws of the United States relating to our merchant marine are so extensive and complicated that in order to intelligently revise them in all their parts and adapt them to existing conditions the services of an official expert in maritime affairs will be necessary. There are, however, some burdens imposed on our merchant marine but not imposed by other maritime nations, so well understood, so clearly unjust and discriminating, whose removal is so generally asked by ship-owners and commercial men in all parts of the country that their immediate abolition is unanimously recommended by your committee. These burdens are as follows:

EXTRA WAGES.

The merchant shipping laws of the United States as they were enacted three-fourths of a century ago, and as they still remain, provide that no seaman shall be discharged from an American vessel in a foreign port without the exaction by the consular officer from the master or owner of the vessel of three months' extra pay, except in a few cases. One-third of this exaction goes to the Government to reimburse it in part for relief and transportation extended to destitute American sailors in foreign ports, and two-thirds to the seaman, subject to such deductions for expenses of the seaman as the consular officer sees fit to make.

These laws were wise and proper when nearly all the seamen on American vessels were citizens of the United States and when the only means of communication with foreign ports was by sailing vessels, making long voyages at irregular times. Under such circumstances the policy of this and other commercial nations was, by means of extra wages exactions, to force vessels in the foreign trade to ship seamen for the round voyage, so that they might be returned to their homes.

But these conditions have passed away. Ninety per cent. of the seamen of American vessels in the foreign trade and 80 per cent. of those manning British vessels are foreigners—Portuguese, Italians, Norwegians, &c., making a class of professional seamen who are as much at home in one port as another. The great body of them, including even most of the American seamen in the foreign trade, desire to leave the vessel as soon as it reaches the outward port of destination; and as seamen no longer discharge the cargo as they formerly did, the vessel prefers that they should leave. Far too frequently the master of the vessel resorts to cruel treatment to induce the seamen to desert, in the expectation that by so doing he will avoid the exaction of extra wages, which, in the case of a vessel discharging twenty seamen, amounts to from $1,200 to $1,500. Frequent disputes arise between consular officers, masters of vessels, and seamen over the settlement of questions involving extra wages, until American ship-masters and ship-owners have become so thoroughly disgusted with the exactions and annoyances growing out of the extra-wages system, known now only to the merchant shipping laws of the United States, that it is regarded as almost a misfortune to sail under the American flag.

Nearly thirty years ago England abolished the extra-wages system almost entirely, retaining an exaction of only one month's extra wages or an equivalent in a few cases, and the change has proved of great advantage to seamen and ship-owners.

As the seaman is cared for, and, if necessary, furnished transportation by the Government, both under the American and English laws, the abolition of the extra-wages system leaves him amply protected, takes away all inducement on the part of the master to abuse the seaman in order to cause him to desert, puts an end to the controversies about extra wages, and removes a serious discriminating burden imposed on the American merchant marine. These desirable results will be accomplished simply by having the Treasury assume the expense of providing for destitute American seamen in foreign ports, which, for the last fiscal year, amounted to $31,596, instead of exacting it from vessels in the form of extra wages. Last year the sum received by Government from American vessels was $39,220, or nearly $8,000 more than the whole amount expended for relief of seamen in the foreign trade. As the Government receives only one-third of the extra wages, the aggregate exaction from vessels for extra wages was nearly $100,000.

We recommend, therefore, that existing merchant seamen laws be amended so as to authorize the discharge of a seaman at the termination of his shipping agreement, or for the causes known to our statutes and the principles of maritime law, on the payment of the wages then due, and so as to forbid the exaction by a consular officer of any extra wages except for five causes; first, sale of a vessel in a foreign country; second, refusal or neglect to suitably provide a vessel on report of inspectors; third, intentional and unnecessary continuance of a voyage contrary to agreement; fourth, cruel treatment; fifth, hurt or injury received in the service of the vessel; and in each of these cases the exaction to be only one month's extra wages.

OFFICERS OF VESSELS.

Inasmuch as so large a proportion of the seamen of American vessels are aliens, it frequently happens on a foreign voyage, on the disability of the mate of the vessel, that it becomes necessary to supply his place with an alien until the return of the vessel to the United States. We recommend a modification to this extent of the law which requires all the officers of an American vessel to be citizens of the United States.

TRANSPORTATION OF SEAMEN.

Under the existing laws American vessels are required to transport destitute American seamen from a foreign port to the United States when requested by a consular officer of the United States, and are allowed only $10 for each seaman so transported, without regard to the length of the voyage. The justice of increased compensation for long voyages is so clear that we recommend an increase to $20 for voyages of over thirty days, and such additional compensation as the First Comptroller deems just when the destitute seaman is so ill or disabled as to be unable to do duty. We further recommend that the number of seamen which any vessel shall be compelled to transport be limited to one for each hundred tons burden, instead of two, as now.

ADVANCE WAGES.

The practice of paying advance wages to seamen has been productive of so grave abuses that friends of the sailor have long sought to prohibit such payment, in order that there might be no fund from which to draw "blood money" and encourage sailor landlords to bleed seamen. The English Government some years ago prohibited the payment of advance wages, and has followed up her original legislation with stringent amendments. While we recognize the difficulty of enforcing legislation against the evils of sailor landlordism, yet we recommend that a step be taken in this direction.

As a necessary complement to the prohibition of the payment of advance wages, we recommend that every vessel be required, on a foreign voyage, to carry a complement of clothing, and supply the same to seamen as they may be needed, at a reasonable cost.

CONSULAR FEES.

American vessels in the foreign trade are subjected to the payment of fees for the official services of consuls, which our laws compel every vessel to avail themselves of. These fees are not only burdensome in the expense necessitated, but also particularly annoying on account of the contentions between consul and master to which they give rise. England wisely abolished the most of such charges on her merchant marine a quarter of a century ago. It would be a just and wise step for Congress to abolish these fees for services to American vessels, which last year amounted to $96,210; and where consular officers are paid in whole or in part by fees, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, under such checks as will prevent improper claims, to allow such officers the same compensation for such services from the Treasury as they would have received had the fees been exacted from vessels, until such time as fixed salaries may be prescribed for all consular officers.

THE TONNAGE TAX.

The existing laws imposing an annual tax of 30 cents per ton on all vessels entering the ports of the United States from foreign ports discriminate against American shipping, for the reason that a large proportion of our vessels engaged in the foreign trade are sailing vessels, making long voyages, and entering our ports not much oftener than once a year, while the foreign steamships, which are controlling so much of our carrying trade, enter from eight to ten times annually. Practically, therefore, we impose a tonnage tax of 30 cents per ton on each entry of such American vessels in our foreign trade, and only 3 cents per ton on each entry of an English steamship. Under our reciprocal treaties with England and other maritime nations we can not impose upon British and other foreign vessels engaged in our foreign trade a larger tax than we impose upon ours; but a decent regard for our own ought to lead us to change the mode of assessment from an annual to an entry tax. This is fair, as the tax should be adjusted to entries or voyages which represent business done, rather than time, as the latter inevitably discriminates against sailing vessels. Moreover, this is precisely the basis on which England imposes her light-dues, which take the place of our tonnage tax.

Notwithstanding England's light-dues assessment is over 12 cents per ton at each entry and clearance for vessels arriving from an American port, and a smaller tax on vessels making shorter voyages, yet in order to make our tonnage tax as light as possible we recommend that it be fixed at 6 cents per ton for the long-voyage foreign trade and 3 cents per ton for the short-voyage trade, in the latter case not to exceed 15 cents per ton per annum. This modification of our tonnage tax will diminish somewhat the amount realized, which in the last fiscal year was $1,320,590, of which $1,057,961 was paid by foreign vessels and $262,629 by American vessels; but it will diminish the amount paid by most American vessels in the foreign trade. In the short-voyage trade with Canada and Mexico, which is largely held by American vessels, it will abolish the tax.

THE HOSPITAL TAX.

Our excellent Marine-Hospital Service, for the care of sick and disabled seamen, is supported by a tax of 40 cents for each seaman (20 cents per seaman up to 1870), which is collected of the vessel, although the vessel is authorized to deduct it from the wages of every sailor. The cost of the service for the last fiscal year, exclusive of alterations of hospital building, was $434,526.

The receipts from the tax were $414,834, of which $329,508 was for seamen in the coastwise trade, $81,507 for seamen in the foreign trade, and $3,818 from the revenue marine. This tax nearly paid the entire expense of the Marine-Hospital Service, which prior to 1870 required an annual appropriation of more than a hundred thousand dollars from the Treasury. There is no tax imposed on vessels or seamen of the British merchant marine for this purpose. English marine hospitals are supported by appropriations by the government and charitable contributions.

Whatever may be said of the justice and wisdom of our hospital tax for seamen in the coastwise trade, it must be evident that our tax for seamen in the foreign trade operates to the disadvantage of American vessels in the free competition on the ocean. While it is true that the tax may be deducted from the wages of the seamen, yet notwithstanding this the testimony is conclusive that American vessels seeking to employ seamen in competition with an English vessel in the same port must either pay the seamen additional wages to cover the tax or else take the inferior seamen left after the English vessel has had its pick of seamen. Obviously, therefore, unless this tax is abolished, and the expense of hospital treatment of seamen in American vessels in the foreign trade borne by the Government, as it is by England, it will be impossible for an American vessel in this trade to navigate the ocean as cheaply, in this respect, as its English competitor. Not only this fact, but also the further facts that seamen in the foreign trade are absent a large part of the time for which the tax is assessed, and that our vessels in the foreign trade pay a tonnage tax (from which coastwise vessels are exempt) much larger than the expense of treating their disabled seamen in hospitals, would seem to justify the abolition of the hospital tax on the former at least, and the assumption by the Government of the comparatively small expense of treating such seamen.

FACILITIES FOR UNLOADING CARGO.

Special facilities are given by existing law for the unloading of "vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam." Inasmuch as most American ships in the foreign trade are sailing vessels, there is no good reason why they should not have the same facilities for discharging cargo under our laws that foreign steamships have. We recommend, therefore, an amendment of sections 2962 and 2870 so as to put sailing vessels and steamships on the same basis in this respect.

REIMBURSEMENT OF IMPROPER EXACTIONS.

Under the provisions of existing laws the Secretary of the Treasury has no authority to remit any penalty or fine or refund any charge illegally or excessively imposed on vessels by consuls and collectors after the same has been covered into the Treasury. As some time necessarily elapses before any claim for remission or reimbursement can be presented to the Treasury, in a large number of cases the Secretary frequently finds himself unable to do simple justice. Inasmuch as an appeal to Congress in such cases is a very inadequate and frequently impossible remedy, we see no reason why the authority of the Secretary to do justice in such cases should not be exercised after as well as before the money illegally or improperly exacted has been covered into the Treasury; and we recommend such a provision of law.

We do not by any means suppose that the removal of the discriminating burdens herein named will alone revive the American foreign carrying trade, especially that large part of the foreign trade which requires steamships. The removal of these burdens, however, is essential as a preliminary step, but other measures must follow. Reserving other measures for further consideration, your committee report back the accompanying bill (H. R. 2228) as amended, with a unanimous recommendation for its passage.

Mr. SLOCUM. Mr. Speaker, the provisions of this bill are so clearly set forth in the report I shall not consume any time in its discussion.

Our navigation laws, like those relating to the militia, have not been changed for almost a century; they are to-day what they were eighty years ago. For fifty years they were precisely the same as those of England. Thirty years ago England modified her laws, and her commercial marine has increased because of that modification.

The bill under consideration proposes to make our navigation laws somewhat similar to those passed by England thirty years ago. This subject has attracted the attention of our people. It has been before Congress for eight or ten years. In the Forty-sixth Congress a special committee was appointed which made a voluminous report. The last Congress appointed a special committee, consisting of three Senators and six members of the House, inviting every person who had an interest in the subject to appear in person or by writing. That committee held sessions in the city of New York for over a month, hearing everybody who felt any interest in the subject. That committee made certain recommendations on certain points. In regard to the change of our navigation laws the committee were united.

The committee of this year has presented in this bill only such measures as the committee of the last Congress were united on. The measures on which that committee differed, the measures upon which we supposed there would be a difference in this House, have been submitted in separate bills. I allude to the bill authorizing the purchase of ships by our citizens and free registry. I allude also to the question of State taxation upon our shipping; I allude to the question of pilotage. All of those things have been excluded from this bill, and we have presented only such measures as we believed would meet the unanimous approval of this House. It is only a measure to sweep away some of the old laws which have been in existence upon our statute-books for nearly a century, and which by the unanimous consent of all ship-owners and ship-masters as well as the merchants of this country should be at once swept out of existence.

I am not going, sir, to occupy the attention of the House any longer, for the simple reason that this bill must be passed to-day if it is passed at all. It is demanded, I believe, by the public interests and necessities, and I will not endanger its passage by occupying a single moment of time longer.

I will now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin on the committee [Mr. DEUSTER].

Mr. HAMMOND. Before the gentleman from New York takes his seat, I did not understand him exactly, and would like to ask whether this bill undertakes to relieve shipping from all State taxation?

Mr. SLOCUM. No, sir. As I have said, we avoided that question altogether.

Mr. DEUSTER. Mr. Speaker, I can not agree with those who believe that the chains which other nations have forged about the world's commerce are so firmly clasped that they may not be loosed when it is once our earnest aim to reconquer for our merchant marine the proud position which in former days it held on the high seas.

Statistics show a striking development and an astounding advance in the movements of the trade of Great Britain and of most of the maritime powers of Europe as compared with those of our own trade. The European fleets cover now the ocean, and the commerce of the world is subservient to them. Great Britain, Germany, France, the Netherlands, and Sweden and Norway, all surpass us under their policy of free ships in the share which they have taken of the navigation of the world.

Germany, which commenced by buying ships of foreign construction, is now building in every ship-yard, and while our tonnage in the foreign trade has been reduced during the last thirty years from 4,400,000 tons to 600,000, the German tonnage in our own trade has within the same period grown from 166,000 tons to 1,252,184, and the British from 935,836 tons to 7,676,279. Even China and Japan have outrun us in the race for the commerce of the seas.

But in spite of the wonderful commercial achievements of the European maritime nations, I still think that it is an erroneous assumption to believe that their control of the world's commerce can be so firmly held that no means can be found by which the United States may not secure a proportionate share of this commerce. I believe rather that the time is near when the American flag will again float on the high seas, when it will again enter the contest for the maritime and commercial supremacy of the Atlantic and of the Pacific. And the means for the acquirement of this supremacy is to be found in the passage of a wise and judicious shipping law, a law inspired by the necessities of a great people ready and able to avail itself of the lessons taught by the progressive march of civilization.

OUR PRESENT NAVIGATION LAWS AND THEIR BURDENS AND WRONGS.

The pending bill, Mr. Speaker, contains many provisions looking to the amendment of our present shipping laws. But as the success of our merchant marine must naturally depend upon the existence of laws calculated to place it on an equality with all of its competitors for the trade of the oceans, I regard it as appropriate to point out such defects in our present navigation laws as in my judgment would operate disadvantageously to our vessels when in search for trade. I have, however, no disposition to needlessly criticise these laws. I will, on the contrary, rather admit that at the time of their adoption they were in harmony with the condition of affairs which then governed our commerce, and I will not question their adaptability to the status which they were originally to effect. But if they were once beneficial, they are not so at present, and it becomes therefore now necessary to confront their defects and to strip off the fungus growth which has come with the passage of time, in order that a wiser legislation may adapt itself to the changed condition of things.

It must be borne in mind that during the thirty years that have elapsed since the commencement of the decline of our shipping interests our navigation laws have remained unchanged in every particular, and this in view of a changed condition of affairs in the world of commerce. They remained stationary, while those of other maritime powers lost their original resemblance to ours and were remodeled on the basis of a more recent experience and greater enlightenment. Of the progress of the last thirty years our shipping laws know nothing, and they are therefore utterly unsuited to the pursuit of the commerce of to-day.

Among the vexed questions which now require a legislative settlement in connection with our shipping interests is especially that of the tax on tonnage. The amount of this tax, as collected by the Government on the tonnage of vessels entering our ports in 1882, was about $1,750,000, of which, however, only the sum of $250,000 was collected from American vessels. In its ultimate effect this tax tends but to a prohibition of trade, and it involves a principle which the maritime world has outgrown. Its natural tendency goes toward an obstruction of the due course of trade by the imposition of a burden which directly lessens the profits of the voyage. It is a manacle to commerce and should be done away with. But though the desirability of the abolition of this tax has been admitted on this floor, it is proposed to continue it on the ground that it principally falls upon foreign vessels. The fact that our own citizens, that some of our foremost merchants, have prayed to be relieved from it is not to be considered, and we are asked to deny justice to our own citizens, and to deny it for a reason that sets at defiance the principle of amity which should primarily regulate our international relations.

In 1852 and subsequently the Parliament of England removed from her navigation laws all provisions which were in any wise oppressive and burdensome to vessels engaged in the foreign trade. At the same time our own Legislature was too firmly held in the shackles of tradition to awake to a sense of what was going on around it. Our navigation laws were therefore preserved as heirlooms, and our Government failed to comprehend the isolation in which it was placed at a time when harmony was prevailing among all other maritime powers. Our Government and our Congress did not even recognize the important fact that a new era in ship-building had dawned, born of new conditions of trade, and so they slept on, like the vagabond of the Catskills, and longer than even he, for thirty good years, without awakening to an understanding of how our shipping interests had been frittered away.

To enter now into some details, let me say here that I am opposed to the retention of all legal provisions according to which a mate must necessarily be an American citizen. I am in accord with the propriety of requiring this qualification in the master of a vessel, but not in his subordinates. Merit and capacity should be the tests in such cases, and a prohibition of any promotion below the rank of a mate, for the want of American citizenship, could not but cause inefficiency in the service. Such provisions of law are not in the line of justice, nor are they calculated to lead to the development of a well-conducted mercantile marine.

When we reflect that 90 per cent. of the crew of American vessels are of foreign birth and that many of them make use of any proximity to their homes to avail themselves of that provision of our navigation laws which allows three months' extra wages where a seaman is discharged at a foreign port by the authority of the American consul resident there, it is, moreover, made very apparent that this provision, too, is a dangerous one and deserving of repeal, as it offers a premium to fraud, while it is at the same time a burdensome and oppressive tax upon the ship-owner.

Another injurious burden from which our merchant vessels have suffered has been their liability to transport destitute seamen to their homes for a fixed compensation of $10, regardless of the actual expense of such transportation.

Our consular fees collected from ship-owners are, besides, in many respects oppressive. They encourage speculation and peculation and an improper administration of the consular offices. England pays her consuls a million of dollars annually to attend to her shipping business; to secure attention to their business, we, however, make our own ship-owners pay annually into our consulates a like amount. A government does not entitle itself to respect by sending its representatives abroad to earn their salaries from private individuals.

The system of advance wages, too, is equally opprobrious and a source of injury to the seaman; for it destroys his efficiency by disheartening him through the thought that all which he is to earn by his hard labor is already gone.

All these obnoxious provisions of our shipping laws should be repealed, and in their stead enactments should be adopted which will impose as light a burden on the American ship-owner as foreign powers have thought it wise to assign to theirs. Only in this way will our ships have any chance in the contest for supremacy.

There is furthermore no principle that I regard as demanding more prompt settlement than that of the liability which is at present attached to part owners of vessels. It will prove a great inducement to capital to make investments in the shipping interest if this liability be fixed and limited by the amount of the original investment. This is a much-needed reform, and I trust that it will receive due consideration.

As to the mooted question of a State taxation of maritime property, it is to be stated that three States have relieved this class of property from taxation, and I believe I am justified in saying that most of it, while this state of affairs exists, will be owned in those States, and that eventually other States will adopt similar legislation, so that any Federal legislation will become unnecessary on this subject. In the face of the doubts to which some of our most distinguished lawyers and jurists have given utterance relative to the authority of Congress to enact a law for the exclusive taxation of maritime property, I have indeed no desire to express any opinion as to the constitutionality of such a law. But I am on the whole strongly of the opinion that a radical change in the entire system of our navigation laws is imperatively necessary, if our ships shall ever again successfully breast the surface of the oceans.

THE CAUSE OF THE DECLINE OF AMERICAN SHIPPING.

From former discussions on the part of Congress I gather that the decline of American shipping has been charged to various causes. But I am satisfied that the most direct and natural cause of this decline can be found in the initiation by England of the building of iron ships, which superseded the class of vessels that had hitherto controlled the transportation and carriage of American freights. The genius of our statesmen seems to have been clouded in the days when England was assuming the supremacy of the seas; for they did not comprehend the power of the propeller nor the magic of steam. To these agencies mainly, to which all the maritime powers of Europe at once resorted, is due the credit which is now attributed to England for the revolution which it largely caused in the commerce of the Atlantic.

To charge the decline of our shipping to the influence of our tariff is an undertaking for which no just foundation will ever be found, and in an article of the North American Review, written by Professor Sumner,

I find indeed a statement of facts which verifies this view. In that article Professor Sumner says:

No doubt these changes—

From wood to iron and from sails to steam—

have been the chief cause of the decline of ship-building in this country, and legislation has had only incidental effects. It is a plain fact in history that the decline in American ship-building began before the war and the high tariff.

The course of England in regard to our shipping during the war, mingled with the exploits of the confederate cruisers, aggravated perhaps the situation still further, and all these evils culminated when capital, immediately after the war, seeking railroad and other speculative investments, had no eyes for such a conservative investment as was offered by the stocks and property of the merchant marine.

OUR LOSSES.

One of the first results of our suicidal naval policy is well shown in the statement that in 1845 the freights transported in the foreign trade upon American vessels were 82.9 per cent. of the whole, while in 1882 this percentage was reduced to 15.5. The statistics relating to the Suez Canal illustrate, besides, the little enterprise and scope that characterize our shipping interests. In the two years following the opening of this great highway of commerce 3,286 English steamers passed through it, and during the same period but eight American steamers.

But the strongest illustration of the deleterious consequences of the decline of our shipping is perhaps to be found in the fact that the charges for freights, if estimated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, at 20 per cent. of an aggregate of American exports and imports to the value of $1,475,132,831, would reach the sum of $295,036,566, and that, on the basis of their tonnage, American vessels received of this magnificent sum but the meager share of $41,908,045, or 22 per cent., while foreign ship-owners pocketed the bulk, or $252,128,521!

AMERICAN ENTERPRISE EVER VICTORIOUS, IF AIDED BY PROPER LEGISLATION.

While England and the continent were devoting their surplus capital to the improvement of their marine, we were engaged in sowing the seed of other great enterprises which were soon to bloom forth and bear golden fruit. Capital, energy, and skill assailed the valleys, the plains, and even the mountain-sides, and called the teeming wealth hidden in the soil out into the bright sunshine. Agriculture was crowned as the primal industry, and all did homage unto her; and from a magnificent beginning her growth has proceeded, and her form has assumed such superb proportions that the world can not but admire and envy. To-day we can furnish food for the entire world, and the first part of the problem, the solution of which is to determine our commercial supremacy, is clearly demonstrated. We are the producers who will supply the markets of the world. The necessities of life have indeed brought to light the part that nature has destined us to perform in the work of feeding the nations. It only remains for us now to prepare the way to transport the products of our soil to every quarter of the globe. And if we solve this problem we may dictate terms to the world of commerce.

But while we contemplate the glad picture of our agricultural achievements, it is worth our while to consider that our merchant marine is now dwindled almost to nonentity, and to look for the means of its speedy revival. I claim that the prosperous condition of our agriculture is due to wise and judicious legislation, and in a similar legislation will, I believe, be found the remedy for the present depression and ruin of our shipping industry.

The principal element which has entered into our legislation concerning agriculture has been that by which we have welcomed to our shores the implements, the discoveries, and the inventions of other lands, which, applied to our bounteous soil and used in the manipulation of its products, have brought forth abundant harvests and have made these harvests available to meet the wants of all mankind.

In admitting to our shores these agents of agriculture without let or hinderance, we have relied upon nothing but the normal action of the natural laws of trade, and to the adoption of this policy alone is to-day due the perfected condition of that industry.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE.

But can we not also apply this policy to our languishing shipping interests? Are we not now to be told that we must strike from the tariff list the steel, iron cable, pipes, tubes, cordage, and wire-rope, and all those things which go to make up the excess in the cost of the American materials employed in the building of iron ships? Let this once be done, and why can we not then build ships? Our capacities for pre-eminence in mercantile pursuits are boundless, and to the skilled shipwright our shores offer a field for unlimited enterprise which he could nowhere else hope to find. From one end of the country to the other there is an abundance of everything which enters into the construction of a ship. And yet with all this we can not build ships. With all our opportunities we seem to have forgotten the traditions of our past, and it looks almost as if we had lost sight of the glory of the future.

A very distinguished member of this House [Mr. COX] described a year or two ago the condition of our merchant marine in so pointed a manner and with such graphic language that I can not forbear to quote him, and this so much the more as this condition has since in no wise been changed. Said he:

The time was when, amid the glory and pride of our country, our models of ships and adventures at sea were the theme of lyre and the praise of eloquence. Our ships were comfort and wealth in peace, hope and safety in war. They were the horn of plenty and the nursery of seamen for the maintenance of our independence and rights.

Why should America not have her part in these glories of the sea? Was she not discovered by the genius, daring, and devotion of Columbus? Were not our colonies created into commonwealths by the men who braved the dangers of the sea to found here new empires? Our country is born of the sea. Its freedom is born of the wind and wave. Shall these praises forever be an echo of the past?

Are we to take no part in the enlightenment and progress in science and art of which commerce is the procreant and infallible cause?

Has the sea rolled back and away from us at the command of the insolent monarchs of capital?

Amid this divided marine dominion in which one power alone has half the power of the ocean, shall America sit scepterless and forlorn, dethroned, ignoble, dispirited, and disgraced?

The ensign of our nationality takes its stars from the vault of heaven. By them brave men sail. It is now an unknown emblem upon the sea. We welcome every race to our shores in the vessels of other nations. Our enormous surplus which feeds the world is for others to bear away. We gaze at the leviathans of commerce entering our harbors and darkening our sky with the pennons of smoke; but the thunder of the engines is under another flag, and the shouting of the captains is in an alien tongue.

Others distribute the produce, capitalize the moneys, gather the glories and elevate their institutions by the amenities and benignities of commerce.

THE PRESENT MEASURE FOR RELIEF.

A bill to permit the unrestricted purchase of ships has been under consideration by a committee of this House, which was chosen in response to a well-defined and loudly-uttered demand of the people for a grant of the right of such purchase. And that bill comes now to us with a majority report adverse to it of 6 to 4, to be immediately assailed by the advocates of subsidies and of rebates, because they happen not to be satisfied with what it permits. Its opponents act indeed boldly and without a semblance of disguise, and an important committee of this House embodies their wishes in a plain, unblushing refusal to comply with the demand of the people for a merchant marine. And this demand is refused in the face of the accepted and universally recognized principle that the wisest legislation is that which promotes the greatest degree of productive industry.

The bill pending now before us embodies the principal features of the English merchant shipping law. A similar law was also adopted by France. And under both these laws the British and French shipping industries have been marvelously stimulated and developed. Yet in the face of this development the United States have clung blindly to their old and fatal maritime policy, and while they have ignored the growth of European navies, these navies have rapidly secured the supremacy of the highways of the universe. Their maritime victory, their success is not now to be disputed, and if we are wise we will accept it as an urgent monitor to follow in their footsteps. Compared with the shipping laws of Great Britain and France, our present navigation laws are but a fraud upon our commerce and a menace to ship buyers and builders. They are but a dangerous relic of a past period of our naval and commercial history, and they ought not a day longer to be tolerated upon our statute-books.

WHY SHOULD AMERICAN SHIP-YARDS BE IDLE?

It has been said that we can not build ships, and that if we bought them or built them we could not compete with the iron ships and the established trade of England on the Atlantic. But Mr. Roach assures us that notwithstanding the higher wages which he pays to his skilled workmen he can build just as cheap and fast a ship as can be turned out of any English ship-yard, and I am of the same opinion. Our resources are vaster and incomparably superior to those of foreign countries. Our facilities are greater than they can possibly exist elsewhere, and after the duty shall once have been repealed from certain materials that enter into the construction of ships, so that we will be enabled to purchase cheaply what we can not make ourselves, I contend that we can even build better and cheaper ships than those which are now built by the ship-builders on the Clyde.

A HIGHER RATE OF WAGES NOT INJURIOUS TO AMERICAN SHIP-BUILDING.

It is alleged as a reason for the depression of our ship-building industry that the cost of American labor and material is so much in excess of the cost of the English labor and material that we are unfit to compete with our English neighbors, and an attempt is made to force the friends of the shipping interest apparently into the position of advocating the lowering of the wages of the American workman. But I prefer that this same workman render himself a decision as to who is most his friend, the man who seeks to rehabilitate our merchant marine, which gave once honorable employment to thousands, or the man who, voicing the cry of protected capital, insinuates that we seek to degrade labor! Any such insinuation is a piece of low demagogism.

Were it but admitted that it was not within our power to build a vessel at as low a cost as it can be constructed on the Clyde, I am nevertheless at a loss to comprehend that a larger expense for wages, and consequently a somewhat larger cost of construction, would so affect a merchant vessel of exclusively American construction as to interfere with its operations in a process of competition with a foreign vessel of equal tonnage. In spite of any greater cost of construction, an American ship possesses invariably compensating advantages which must more than overbalance a real or apparent disadvantage of a higher cost, and these advantages are geographical advantages. In measuring the probable value and usefulness of an American merchant vessel our proximity to Canada, Mexico, and South America must ever be taken into consideration. These countries are destined by nature to form an invaluable continuation of the chain of our coastwise trade. Our proximity to them alone involves figures against which a higher cost of our vessels would make little display, and in view of this invaluable advantage we can at all times well afford to construct our vessels at a somewhat higher cost.

THE VALUE OF GOOD LAWS AND OF PLUCK.

If we are in search of the beneficial effects of self-reliance, pluck, and a liberal legislation, we can observe them in the earlier history of our own merchant marine.

It is known to but few that this marine dates its existence back to the seventeenth century. Yet in 1660 six hundred American sail plowed already the waters of the Atlantic. Then for a hundred and thirty years a reign of universal free trade prevailed, and under its impetus the year 1789 found our merchant marine developed into a fleet of 124,000 tons, controlling a hundred thousand tons of foreign trade and besides a large domestic coastwise trade, together with extended fisheries.

In that year, also, to meet the effects of a series of offensive and restrictive treaties which had just been concluded between the principal European maritime powers, we issued, to the great astonishment of those powers, peremptorily our declaration in favor of the freedom of the seas and against the continuation of the right of search and other maritime abuses.

Boldly we defied the navies of the world. Fearlessly we possessed ourselves of the broad seas. Our ships sailed to all parts of the world, and in the short space of sixteen years our tonnage engaged in the foreign carrying trade grew, as a consequence, from 124,000 tons to 749,341.

But soon there were no bounds to the hostility of the foreign powers against our ships and our commerce, and through the brutal impressment practices of Great Britain and the restrictive decrees of France it was sought to sweep the oceans of American shipping.

Yet it was this very hostility which developed our merchant marine and which made it invincible. Thousands of American seamen had been taken from our ships. Nearly 2,000 American ships with their cargoes were confiscated under the decrees of Great Britain and France. This was not to be endured, and soon the American flag waved defiantly over the waters.

Soon, too, the indignation to which insults and wrongs had given rise among the American people, and especially among our sailors, brought forth good fruits, and the world witnessed in 1812 a marvelous exhibition of daring, of glorious heroism. For three years the contest continued. We captured 2,500 British ships, and the value of an aggressive course was once more demonstrated.

It required but twenty-one years more, and the supremacy of the seas was almost ours. Four hundred and eighty million dollars' worth of commerce came now annually to and from our shores, and in 1850 nearly 2,500,000 tons of an aggregate of 8,000,000 tons of shipping, which were then handled at our ports, were carried by American ships. In thirty years we had reached a point where, having built 4,000,000 tons of shipping, we were suddenly compelled to hire a million and a half of tons to meet the demands of our carrying trade.

BUY AND BUILD.

Mr. Speaker, I should not be inclined to favor the mere granting of the right to buy and register foreign vessels unless this step involved an avowed determination on the part of Congress to grant this right mainly as a mere stepping-stone to the greater work of building ships for our merchant marine. The former would prove in my mind rather an injury than a blessing; but unite the two propositions, and I see in their union the happiest results. The passage of the pending bill can not therefore but be an earnest that the Government has roused itself from its long lethargy; that it is no longer willing to sanction and tolerate the revolting idea that our carrying trade to the extent of more than $200,000,000 in freights shall remain in the hands of any enterprising foreign ship-owner who will underbid us for its carriage. Its passage is in fact to demonstrate that the deadly touch of ignorance and blindness has been removed from our minds and our eyes, and that the warm blood of revivification is again to be imparted to the American merchant marine. Then will it again be found that we have seamen worthy of the name, and that the same energetic spirit which once made America the mistress of the seas is still regnant within her bosom.

The investment in the construction of an American ship of an amount of capital one-third greater than that at which a vessel of equal capacity can be constructed on the Clyde places, with the accompanying burden of interest on the increased cost, undoubtedly the former at a striking disadvantage, if used in an equal competition; but such is actually the disadvantage under which the American-built ship now labors. This is wrong, and we certainly are responsible for the correction of this wrong. And therefore I think, Mr. Speaker, that no work which this House can accomplish at this session will create such a feeling of enthusiasm in the country as the recognition of the popular desire for a renewed supremacy of the American flag upon the high seas.

The time has come when we should grant to every citizen who desires to become a ship-owner the absolute right to go into the markets of the world and to select his ships wherever he deems best. Let him buy the best and cheapest vessel wherever it may be found, and then allow him the same privileges, the same ownership in that vessel, which he would under our laws enjoy in any other property if bought abroad. Do not deny him the advantage of registry. Do not shut him off from the coasting trade. Reverse rather, unhesitatingly, your present policy. In short, give the amplest protection to the ship-buyer, and if you do this your experiment will create a navy.

We want to buy ships and to build ships, but we want no subsidies. We want the removal of the odious legal restrictions which have so long hampered our maritime enterprise. We ask only to have our ships freed from the dusty spider-web of antiquated legislation, that they spread their wings again amid the buzz and hum of the seaports of the world.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have already argued the questions connected with our maritime resuscitation in former Congresses. I was on the special committee in the last Congress for the investigation of these maritime questions. We reported with much accord measures for the amelioration of our shipping interests. Therefore it is that I presume to claim your attention.

May I quote from the conclusion of the report (report 1827, second session Forty-seventh Congress), I had the honor to draft for the minority of the joint committee? It is the text from which I propose to discourse:

The decadence of our shipping and its causes are all too familiar to the public mind. The selfishness which prevents its resuscitation are no less familiar. It is an old, old story. The minority of the committee would repeat it in detail were it not known to every tyro in commerce and economy. They would rehearse it if, by studying the causes of the decay, we could remove the effects. The simple truth is, the removal of the causes of decay would not revive shipping. Our shipping interests have been choked by other interests—choked to death. Restrictions cumber our statutes. In a country so abundant in production as ours, which seeks every market, and is unlimited in its range of enterprise, the capital policy is, mare liberum. Give us a free sea and freedom to trade upon its bosom, permit us to buy in the best market the materials to fashion vessels of the best quality and to buy the completed ship where our competitors buy their vessels, and even without the opportunity which foreign wars may give to our carrying trade, and with the aroused inventive faculty of America consequent upon our freedom to use our energy and skill, and with the natural laws and their conditions to aid intelligence and interchange, and we may once more find the capital, labor, and genius of our countrymen evoke from the sea, as they have from the land, its most valued treasures. Our merchant marine languishes for lack of liberty. Its revival must come from the enlargement of our freedom.

The minority of the joint select committee while concurring with the report as to the measure reported by the committee, desire also to present two other propositions:

First. For the admission free of duty of all the materials finished and perfected and ready to put together in a ship; and Second. For the free admission to American registry of ships built abroad.

Is it worth while, sir, to say to the American Congress at this stage of our improgressiveness that our foreign shipping is a mere skeleton? Why, sir, its very dry bones protrude from the sands where it stranded. Its prostration has not been caused so much by being left alone, as a Senator once called it, a poor orphan, cared for by no paternal government. It has been ruined by overcoddling. Too much unhealthy petting within our own coasts and waters has been its death. It lacked the free air and wild wave of competitive energy.

I am surprised, I was about to say mortified, that in a Congress made up, I think, of a majority of men who should cultivate the liberalities of interchange, whose party watchwords and platforms are inspired by the spirit of freedom—that on this bill, which has many good features, nothing appears that would substantially restore the dominion we once held upon the seas. While copying so many English maritime lineaments in more recent parliamentary legislation we have not transcribed in this measure the main feature of the English code, to wit, free registry and free purchase of ships in the markets of the world.

My friend in front of me pertinently suggests what I accept, that we have failed to adopt free trade in all of the materials which enter into the present ship-building in its new modes, conditions, and qualities.

I regret, sir, that my party, after obtaining this splendid majority here, is not permitted to vote upon any proposition to unburden the iron and steel vessel in whole or in its parts. Yes; this is a bill ostensibly to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade; but our ships are not really relieved by the sections reported from the exactions of the custom-house and the prohibitions of our navigation laws. These exactions do more to paralyze our foreign trade than all the other elements of discouragement combined.

Our shipping has been lost to us partly because since our war there has been a change from building the old wooden vessels to the construction of those of iron and steel. England had the advantage of us in that direction. This is perhaps the procreant and paramount cause of her outstripping us in the career of commercial greatness. What a terrible fall is here! Less than a half-century ago, in 1840, we carried in American ships the same percentage that foreign ships now carry. Then we carried about one-sixth of our imports and exports in American bottoms; now foreigners carry about five-sixths of our imports and exports. Oh, most marvelous and humiliating decline! And yet we have increased in the value of our imports and exports from $231,227,465 in 1840 to $1,567,071,700 in 1882. We present the piteous spectacle of a great and advancing nation whose shipping laws deliberately turn over to foreigners, and especially to the British, of whom we are most jealous, a sum equivalent to nearly one hundred and forty millions of fares and freightage. A wise prescience in this Congress, such as this House displayed in 1870, on the recommendation of President Grant, but in which the Senate did not concur, would have brought to our country these vast largesses.

I will not now argue, for I have already done it elaborately and often, the causes which led to this unexampled decay of our shipping. We all know now that it was not the war or its Alabamas that caused its decadence, for if the war destroyed any of our vessels the more need existed for building others to replace them.

Nor will I refer to the fact that the various legislative experiments made here, such as the Lynch law of 1872, intended to help wooden vessels, have been more or less failures. It is certain that they have been fruitless of permanent good.

True, we have passed one bill at this session which may do something toward showing us our defects and the causes of our defeats, and thus lead us through the collation of information to rebuilding our lost carrying trade. I refer to the bill for the creation of a bureau of navigation. I hope that bureau will blaze out a pathway for the restoration of our shipping, but I have not much faith in mere bureaus. When I see a Democratic majority here compelled to listen to clauses in a bill and reports adverse to Democratic platforms and free policies I do not expect much from Departments which are incrusted all over with the illiberal policies of the dead and fruitless past.

Mr. FINDLAY. May I interrupt the gentleman from New York?

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. FINDLAY. I understood a moment ago, if I heard the gentleman correctly, that in his judgment it would have been a very important feature and one that he would like to have seen ingrafted upon the bill if the committee in their report had allowed the materials that are imported into this country from abroad and which enter into the construction of ships to be imported free of duty. Now, I wish to say to the gentleman that there is a provision to that, effect already upon the statute-books.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know all about that for that is a subject we have discussed here before; but I am referring now to a different provision.

Mr. FINDLAY. And the gentleman will find that provision is made for that in section 2513 of the Revised Statutes, and I call his attention to it.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know about that.

Mr. FINDLAY. And the only reasons why there was not such a provision as he has indicated placed in the bill was that there was that existing law for it already.

Mr. COX, of New York. Ninety per cent. of it.

Mr. FIEDLER. No, sir; there is no 90 per cent. about it. It is all admitted free, as he will find.

Mr. COX, of New York. Well, the gentleman will have his own time and we will not discuss that question here. I am sure either he or I have gotten hold of the wrong law. Materials are not free, else why my amendment last Congress and my present amendment?

Under our present condition of affairs men who are building ships now prefer to build them all iron or steel, and there is a burden upon the plates which enter into the construction of this class of ship-building. My amendment is not covered by any existing law. If it were it could do no harm even if it did no good. My amendment would allow the material which enters into the steel or iron ships to come in, not to disturb any one's industries, but to assist such industries by making free the plates and other "raw material" of ships.

My amendment, wherewith I propose to supplement the free-ship amendment, provides that—

All or any part of the materials, whether wood, steel, or iron, copper, yellow metal, bolts, spikes, sheathing, trenails, canvas for sails, whether flax or cotton; rigging and cordage, whether hemp, manila hemp, or iron wire; anchors and cables, iron plates, castings and forgings, angle-irons, beams, masts, yards, rivets, bolts, nuts, screws, engines, boiler plates and tubes, and machinery, and all other materials and appliances which may be necessary for the construction and equipment, in whole or in part, of vessels of not less than 3,000 tonnage, to be built and furnished in the United States after the 1st day of August, 1884, for the foreign trade, including the trade between Atlantic and Pacific ports, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and upon proof that such materials have been used for such purposes no duties shall be collected or paid thereon.

It will thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that these materials and appliances comprehend all that may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels. It will also be seen that, unlike the law of 1872, it is not limited to wooden ships. It is intended for the latest style and build of craft. Besides, it will be seen that I propose to limit the vessels thus to be constructed and equipped out of these free materials to 3,000 tons measurement. Why is this? Not because I do not favor the fullest right of our citizens to buy a ship of any kind or size wherever they choose, but because I desire to carry my amendment. As I may not succeed with my best thought, which I have so often contended for here, may I not defer somewhat to the less advanced ideas of those who are timid and fearful lest we may destroy our coasting trade and our existing industries?

Therefore, sir, I shall offer to this bill such an amendment as will limit the registry to foreign-built vessels over 3,000 tonnage. That should go along with or go before the admission of free materials. Thus you will aid the ship-owner while you help the ship-builder. To one you give liberty to buy; to the other the privilege to build. From one you take away the odious restriction and prohibition, and for the other you lay at his feet for iron and steel ships what we have done by the law for wooden vessels.

If it be said, Mr. Chairman, that the purchase of ships or materials for them abroad to be freely imported here will ruin our ship-yards, I answer as I did here on the 6th of January, 1883, that—

In time, as in Germany, the ownership leads to repair, and repair to building. The number of ship-yards and workshops increases, and the tonnage leaps up under this impulse. That which seemed a mustard-seed becomes a mighty tree. Every nation has tried the free-ship experiment but the United States, and we are lowest to-day in our proportionate share of the navigation of the world. No one can say it is a failure until it is tried. All other schemes—and especially its opposite, protection—have been tried and failed. The commercial eminence of Great Britain, not to speak of Germany, France, Italy, and Norway, is supreme logic for the trial of the experiment. Germany is the best illustration; she has not as good coal and iron as we have, but she began to buy her ships on the Clyde, as we might have done a score of years ago. She is now building her own iron steamships. She builds now more than she buys. She has never subsidized. Her tonnage in 1856-'57, when ours began to decline, was but 166,000 tons; last year she had 950,000; ours in eleven years dropped from 4,400,000 to 600,000, and all its vast income was lost.

Last week I read that a new steel steamship, the Rugia, of 6,500 tons, was turned out for our trade from the Vulcan Works at Stettin, warranted for the safety of 1,200 passengers, with steel life-boats and steam stearing-gear and a refinement in the reversal of her engines in seven seconds. German growth has been in iron-screw steamers, which she began to buy abroad. They could not afford to wait, this phlegmatic people, for their own ship-yards to arise, but began to repair in the blacksmith-shops and little founderies of their "free towns," and now where the little furnace glowed mighty engines are made to mate the ocean in its wildest tempest!

Even Japan has a fleet of fifty-seven iron steamers, and China leaves us laggard and unprogressive. Fifty years of Cathay—nay, twenty years—is worth more than a century of our experience.

Twenty years ago Norway and Sweden traded with us and had but 20,000 tons in the trade; now they have 850,000. The Viking is abroad, and we are stupidly looking on. Everybody is making money out of our carrying and commerce but ourselves. What avails it that ours is the largest carrying trade of any nation since we do not do the work? It adds to the humiliation.

Are there other remedial agencies? Yes, sir. Let us exempt our ships from taxation—local, if it be not already done in most of the States. It is not necessary perhaps to do that in this bill; besides, the power is questioned. Let us exempt from Federal taxation vessels in our foreign trade. I would go with the intelligent gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] and my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] in enacting the various measures of this bill, such as the sections relative to seamen and their discharge and wages, to consuls and their duties and fees, to tonnage taxes and other exactions, and to warehousing, loading, penalties, &c.

But I would go further. I would repeal the tonnage-tax altogether as a burden out of the war. I would make ship supplies free, adopt new rules for the new classes of seamen and the new elements of seagoing and ship-building, make as inexpensive as possible to builder and merchant the running of ships, and reduce if not repeal altogether the hospital-tax on the sailor.

Yet after all these petty reforms there would be the main thing to be done. Without liberty to buy and build, all these reliefs will be in vain. The great desideratum, freedom, will be wanting. That left out, the rest is of little moment. The bill will fall as useless for a revival of our merchant marine as that of the act of 1872.

We want, sir, no mere partial relief. Little patches and repairs can not rehabilitate or strengthen our commerce upon the sea. It has to be built anew, on new ideas and material. You may do all you please; modify your shipping laws to suit every little detail of local complaint. You may remove all these various burdens which hinder the restoration of our merchant marine, such as the English code has removed. I will aid you in all this. I would go further; I would compensate in a fair way for mail service, without giving bounties or subsidies. I would take away compulsory mail carrying, which is a cruelty, if not a vice of administration. I would abolish, and I am sorry this committee has not proposed to abolish, all intermediaries which so vex and try the patience and purse of our shippers—I mean the shipping commissioners, who stand between the ship-owner or the captain and the men employed as seamen on the ship, to the detriment of commerce. I would prohibit the advance wages and the "blood money," which has been so often referred to here as an unpleasant incident or impediment to the restoration of our shipping interests. These reforms I would make. But after all the capital delinquency remains. It will remain so long as our citizens are tethered within a narrow round of purchase and construction.

All the details of the nineteen sections of this bill are insignificant. They remove the mere insect bites upon the skin. Their removal will not eradicate the deep-seated disease that now preys upon the vitals of our commerce.

When we look at the English codes and notice how under their administration that people have dominated the commercial world from China to Peru and from Africa to "farthest Ind," we may learn something for instruction and remedy.

Why should not the amendments I propose receive the help of the commercial and border States as well as of those States where commercial freedom is taking hold of the popular mind, as in the Northwest and South? This so-called shipping-restoration bill of the committee is a misnomer. It is a mere bagatelle without my amendment. It is Hamlet, Polonius, King, Queen, and all left out of the play. The gentleman from Maine ought to have accepted the free-ships and free-materials amendments, especially as the statutes of the United States now provide for wooden-ship materials to come in free. These things he ought to have done, and not to have left the others undone. His infinitesimal benefits to the commercial marine are well enough as far as they go, but they do not reach the point at issue. It is not asked so much that Americans should be relieved from the extra cost of sailing their ships as that they should first be relieved from the extra cost of the ships themselves. The remission of consular fees, of three months' extra pay, of tonnage and hospital dues, which are the only financial gains of any importance, would aggregate in the expense of sailing a steamship of the value of $500,000 at the most liberal calculations not more than $5,000 per annum. This is all the bill does, leaving out my amendment.

Now, the gentleman from Maine himself knows, for he has stated it as the result of his correspondence with Scotch ship-builders, that they will build such steamships as were instanced in the evidence before our committee last Congress for 30 per cent. less than the price charged by Mr. Roach. In such a ship as has been referred to this difference would then be $150,000 if she cost $500,000 abroad. Let the gentleman make this simple calculation: Interest on the superfluous $150,000, $9,000; insurance at 7 per cent., $10,500; wear and tear and depreciation (which it is customary to allow at 7 per cent.), $10,500; total, $30,000. Thus it will be seen that while by saving $5,000 we place ourselves on a par with Englishmen in the cost of sailing our ships, we remain at a disadvantage of $30,000 in running them.

In view of these indisputable facts why should we still continue to protect foreigners in our carrying trade and shut out our own people from the profits that might accrue to them? Why give to the Briton the $140,000,000 fares and the freightage when our enterprising capitalists are eager to invest their millions in this country under our flag, shorten the Atlantic passage, and make their ships useful to this country in time of war? Why drive them under foreign flags?

After all, Mr. Speaker, it comes down plainly to this, as I said fifteen years ago in Maine and ten years ago in this House, that our navigation laws will not let us build, our tariffs will not let us buy, and so we are derelict to ourselves and shamed before the world. Give us the right to build under fair conditions, and let us repeal our navigation laws so as to buy, and we are handicapped no longer in this splendid race for oceanic adventure and profit.

But gentlemen say to you, Mr. Speaker, that our registry laws are protective of our commercial interests; that but for them our ship-owning and ship-building interests would fail. Why, how could we be worse off than we are now? These grand props and pillars in our commercial edifice, have they not been from the earliest times of the Government? Is not their gathered wisdom now apparent in the piteous spectacle of a shipless Republic—a foreign nonentity? These navigation laws have had their opportunity to resuscitate shipping. Have they done it? They are now in vigorous existence, and yet we have scarcely one vessel that crosses the Atlantic under our ensign.

Oh, yes; we are emulous of the daring of the Drakes and other worthies of the days of Spanish, Dutch, English, and Portuguese enterprise. Oh, yes; when we transport from Egypt that strange and mysterious monolith Cleopatra's needle from that ancient realm to our new hemisphere were we not prompt to allow the adventurous and skillful Lieutenant-Commander Gorringe a free registry for the Egyptian steamer Dessoug which bore its strange freight from Alexandria to New York and bound the land of the Pharaohs and Plotemies to the land of Washington and Franklin? Oh, yes; we send our adventurous young men to the regions of enduring ice, to ravish from frigid nature some of her mysterious secrets; and in doing this do we hire a vessel from one of our own petted builders, or make our rescuers sail in ships whose robust timbers have drunk their stoutness from the balmy air of Florida and whose armors of iron have received their sinewy might in the forges of Pennsylvania? In this humane adventure we receive one of our vessels as a gift from our rival and another we buy from strangers. Over both float our flag. Our navigation laws are repealed, forsooth, only when the Government is in dire need. The registry doors of the Treasury fly open only before the request of archæology and the cry of humanity from the heart of our sympathetic people.

Have we indeed deserted the sea? It is said that we have vessels made in our own ship-yards for our coastwise trade, and under certain conditions and laws we build vessels for certain countries abroad. But the great body of our tonnage that once floated on the sea with our foreign adventure is swept from the very bosom of the deep. Three years ago I traveled 17,000 miles on the ocean and saw but once our flag over a steamer. This fatal condition is not because we have not had registry laws that are absolutely prohibitory. This great downfall may not be the direct and traceable consequence of these very laws, but while they exist we cannot recuperate our olden strength. They paralyze.

As a representative of the great emporium of commerce, and at the proper time, under advice from our best and most worthy merchants, I wish to make an amendment to this bill, providing that from and after its passage it shall be lawful for any citizen or citizens to import iron or steel built ships of not less than 3,000 tons measurement free of duty, and such ships shall be admitted to an American registry, provided that such ships shall be the exclusive property of a citizen or citizens of the United States; and provided further, that such ships shall be excluded from the coastwise trade. I make this attempt to approximate my principle so as to save any question. This proposition is not based, as I would prefer, on any general principle that we ought to allow ships to come in whether for purposes of foreign or of coastwise trade; or in other words, the right to buy the best and cheapest vehicles of transportation.

But I am now proceeding on the idea of equity, cy pres, it is called, to get as near as possible to the right, if we can not reach altogether the right.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion just there?

Mr. COX, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. There was a most important delegation from Philadelphia before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors a few days since, and they said the only line of steamers between an American and a foreign port that floated the American flag at this time was one line between Philadelphia and Europe. That was their statement; only that, and none other.

Mr. COX, of New York. And that line——

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Nearly broken up.

Mr. COX, of New York. That line is bankrupt to-day, as I understand, and I am sorry for it; or, to be more exact in my information, let me say as to the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE] about the owners of this American line of steamers, that the line is run by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. That company owned a few worthless American-built steamers; these the company sold, but the line is operated by running chartered foreign-built ships. So you see, sir, American capital is now engaged in foreign commerce. Is it not a shame that our money has to hide in clandestine ways under foreign flags?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that there is scarcely a steamship leaving the port of New York sailing under the American flag. I do not suppose there is one steamship sailing to Europe from the port of New York under the American flag, and there has not been, if my recollection be correct, since the breaking down of the Collins line of steamships. Now, sir, if the gentleman from New York will permit me, I wish to say that the enterprising merchants of the city of Philadelphia——

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman will have plenty of time of his own to make his statement.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Only a moment. The enterprising merchants of the city of Philadelphia for ten years sustained a line of four steamships built by the capital of the enterprising men of Philadelphia; and those steamships are still sailing from the port of Philadelphia to the port of Liverpool every week or every two weeks, as it may be.

I do not pretend to say that they have sailed them at a profit, for they have not done so. But I want to improve this opportunity of setting before this House the enterprise of the business people of Philadelphia, who, after having invested two and a half millions of dollars in building these four steamships, the best steamships ever built in this country, and built on the Delaware River, now find that they are not profitable. They are not bankrupt exactly, but I know they are sailing without a profit.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not dispute what the gentleman from Philadelphia [Mr. O'NEILL] says, nor do I find fault with—in fact I applaud the enterprise of those gentlemen who, under the obstacles presented by our legislation, have endeavored to do so much for our flag and commerce. I know that, disgusted and wearied with our laws, capital has gone abroad. It has been invested, as I have said, under foreign flags.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope not.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I am sure not.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope not; but the great body of men who were once interested in ship-building have mostly gone into other employments and other business. They have abandoned their old calling. Our laws drove them from their ventures by sea. Our ship-masters of the elder day are gone. Who is there to take their place? The pride of the ocean in the old packet days has disappeared. Where are our maritime steel steamers to keep up with the time and herald our future? Our ship-building as a trade has no longer apprenticeship. It is almost an obsolete art. Sir, who is responsible for the supineness and neglect by which so much has been lost? Who, if not Congress? While we have lent a listening ear to men who would clamor and scheme to obtain our "surplus" for their own selfish ends, we have not raised the old banner on the ocean as the symbol of our freedom and the proof of our heroism and enterprise.

Perhaps I should not find fault with the fact that our old and best merchants have given over the bravery and pluck, the risk and romance of their old pursuit. In the minority report on this subject, which I submitted in the last Congress, I stated, hypothetically rather, that no great increase or revival would take place until we had reached a maximum in other lines of labor and enterprise, especially in agriculture. When that maximum is reached and our energies are diverted to other channels the ocean may have its former attraction and yield its opulent remuneration to our people.

I am not prepared now to say that we have made money or that we have lost money since the war by allowing others to carry our produce abroad. Perhaps at the rate at which they have carried it we could afford to allow them that office of carrier while our labor was more remunerative in other spheres. Although it may not be or may not seem that we have made money, or that we have lost money by reason of this foreign trade going into other hands, nevertheless it may be true that our quick-witted men of enterprise have not hitherto been so very much at fault in allowing other nations to do our carrying trade.

Mr. MCADOO. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MCADOO. Was there not a plank in the Democratic national platform in 1876 in favor of free ships?

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe there was, but I am not debating this matter from any political or partisan standpoint.

If I were disposed to make the straight issue according to my own convictions, I would either allow foreign ships to be brought into this country for free registration, or if it were insisted that we needed revenue, would lay a tariff tax upon them of so much per ton ad valorem, say 25 or 20 per cent., or at least allow the material for ship-building to be bought in the markets of the world and entered without duty, for the renewal of our grass-grown ship-yards and the employment and training of the future builders of our maritime fleet.

I am sorry that in reporting this bill the committee has not taken notice of one great grievance which our ship-owners in Maine as well as in New York and elsewhere have complained of; that is, the necessity of abolishing the office of ship commissioner. At the proper time I will show how that office has been abused in New York city. I will move, as I moved before in this House in the last Congress, that that office shall be placed under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the appointing power shall be vested in him, and that there shall be no fees collected and no salary demanded for the execution of the present laws in relation to the shipping of seamen.

This is the demand of our shippers in relation to that office. I hold as a general principle that the Government has no right to interpose intermediaries between the ship-master or the ship-owner and the servants or sailors whom he employs. There is not such an exceptional condition of things with respect to sailors that we should break down a system of fair dealing between man and man, or allow, as in the case of New York Commissioner Duncan, any man to have his three sons and one nephew to absorb all the sums paid into his office in order to keep the members of his family running on large salaries.

But I have not the time to do more than to append a statement to these remarks as to this officer. This statement is from the answer of the New York Times in a libel suit brought by the commissioner. It is a crying evil that this nepotism and disregard of law should so long go unrebuked. Since there is no other way to remedy the evil I will offer an amendment on that very subject. I will offer the same one which passed this House at its last session. I hope it will be accepted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]. He assisted me in modifying it then when it was presented.

Mr. FINDLAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. COX, of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. FINDLAY. I would ask the gentleman whether his opposition to the provisions of the existing law, providing for the appointment of a commissioner, is an opposition to the office itself or to some man who happens to fill that particular office in New York?

Mr. COX, of New York. To both.

Mr. FINDLAY. Whether the opposition is to a shipping commissioner or to Commissioner Duncan?

Mr. COX, of New York. It is to both. My constituents are opposed to the law itself and to the man who executes the office, to say the least, most unsatisfactorily. The law is bad, but the execution of it is worse. This House will see, when the occasion offers, the facts in the suit brought by this Commissioner Duncan against the New York Times for libel—in that suit, in which he got 12 cents for his character, and nothing at all, according to the verdict, for what the Times said about his execution of the duties of this office. If this be understood, and the court record will demonstrate it, there will not be one man in this House or Senate who will not vote to remove the commissioner by vacating an office which is so unhappy in its operation.

Mr. SLOCUM rose.

Mr. COX, of New York. I know that my colleague [Mr. SLOCUM] is impatient to get a vote on this bill. Perhaps I am speaking from rather too much fullness on this subject. If my colleague had given to it the anxious study that I have in committee and elsewhere he would not be impatient with me. That study commenced nearly twenty years ago. Perhaps it was this view of this question that led the citizens of New York at first to send me here as their representative. I crave my colleague's indulgence. I know that he is a man who would use the sword to cut the Gordian knot of debate. He has used the sword otherwise with great credit to himself and honor to the country. I hope this gentle compliment will keep him in his seat for about one minute longer. [Laughter.]

I believe, sir—and with this I will conclude—that we can not build ships of steel or iron in this country while our present tariff remains except at a loss of from 20 to 33 per cent. I am not speaking of wooden ships, but of iron and steel ships.

I do not know otherwise how we shall revive our shipping except through some miracle from Heaven or some conflict on earth. In the Crimean war our vessels did much carrying for the belligerents and trading generally. We received great and paying income from that source. Perhaps European wars will disturb the disgraceful monotony of our present incompetency and inadequacy in shipping and commerce.

We have now presented to this House by my colleague [Mr. ADAMS] a bill which comes from New York merchants, Mr. Corbin and his associates. They are men of capital, enterprise, and integrity. They propose to start their vessels from the eastern end of Long Island and cross the ocean by their improved ships in five days. And, sir, they ask for no subsidy. They ask only that they shall have the privilege of buying their ships in the open market of the world and of being registered on our list. Why should such enterprise be subjected to vexatious prohibitions? Why should these projectors be driven under alien flags?

When the causes of our commercial ruin have been brought home to the understanding of our toilers in the ship-yards and the merchants in their counting-rooms, the system of prohibition is doomed. Is American industry to be forever like an imaginary cripple, afraid to lay aside its crutches though he be able to walk better without them? Repeal our restrictive laws, and five years will not roll away before we will by free labor hold our own market and contend with the foreigner successfully in the markets of the world.

There are marvels of physical progress coming fast forward. They astound by their wondrous utilities. We have lately had before committees of this House—the Shipping Committee, the Naval Committee, and I think the Committee on Commerce—a distinguished ex-captain of the Swedish navy. I refer to Captain Lundburg. He is a fit compatriot of Ericsson and Nordenskjöld. He has developed and shown us his plan. It is generally accepted, I believe, by gentlemen who have studied it and by experts. He demonstrates that his vessels may cross the Atlantic in less than five days. What marvel next?

In my despair at the dilatory, not to say unwise, legislation here for the revival of our navigation I turn as a believer in our material advancement to the Baconic inductions of physics and the probable results of our utilitarian methods of research. Invention is not a newborn muse, which descants upon a new order to usher in a new era; for the ancients reckoned the inventor as among the heroes and demi-gods along with the founders of empire. What may not come in the form of material development to relieve us and bring back our olden and golden glory upon the sea! Our age is one of natural forces with wondrous practical applications. These forces, including the vapor of water and the spark of electricity, along with other elements not yet known, are the subtile agents harnessed by man, powers we know not what or whence, but powers in league with the reason and genius of man, to do his work on land and ocean for the amelioration and civilization of our kind.

By these forces we are day by day bringing nations closer and closer to each other. Oceans no longer divide. That mysterious realm is no longer an abyss. It is bridged. The elements harmonize and unite. Where once there was a flaming bound, now there are well-known paths over the bosom of the deep, traced by the genius of Maury and traveled by the steamer which mates the ocean in its wildest saturnalia. This House, elected on principles of reciprocity and liberality, may, in harmony with material advancement, at least do what was done by the last Republican House, which, professing no special creed on these topics and although it repented of its generous vote the next day and reversed its action, did adopt the two propositions I have here urged—one for free materials, to help the ship-builder, and the other for free ships, to help the ship-owner. I trust that these may clasp hands, and go as one and together, for the enhancement of our mercantile marine and for the glory of our starry flag. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOCUM. Mr. Speaker, I believe that every member of this House desires to see this bill become a law. It is a bill of nineteen sections. Unless it passes to-day it will be lost. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the consideration of the bill by sections be proceeded with under the five-minute rule. In this way ample time will be allowed for debate, and if this proposition be agreed to the friends of the bill can hope for its passage before the adjournment this evening; otherwise I think there is danger of its failure.

Mr. PARKER. Considering that the committee and those whom the committee have authorized to speak in their place have occupied an hour and a half or more on this bill, the speaking happening to have come entirely from that side of the House, I make objection, knowing that my name is next on the list, and that, unless the committee control the entire time, I may have an opportunity to say something in regard to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York that the discussion has occupied in all fifty-five minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Then I correct my remark in that respect.

Mr. DINGLEY. Only fifteen minutes have been occupied by the committee.

Mr. SLOCUM. The time has not been occupied by the committee at all. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] is entirely mistaken.

Mr. PARKER. Did not the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER] occupy time on behalf of the committee?

Mr. SLOCUM. I move that general debate on this bill be closed in thirty minutes; and on that motion I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion can be entertained by unanimous consent only. Is there unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be closed in thirty minutes? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PARKER. If I can be recognized for fifteen minutes I shall be satisfied.

Mr. SLOCUM. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent general debate on this bill will close in thirty minutes. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] for fifteen minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I felt an interest in the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DEUSTER], for he resides upon one of the great lakes which might be much affected by the provisions of this bill, and more by other provisions which ought to be in it. But I failed to notice that he said much in relation to the local interests of the northern lakes, while he gave a great part of his time to the general subject of shipping.

I sympathize largely with the suggestion of my colleague [Mr. COX] that this bill does not go far enough. It is well enough, perhaps, so far as it goes; but it seems to me it brushes away too few of the barnacles attached to our shipping.

Besides, the bill, in my view, while it relates very largely to matters affecting our sea-going ships, does not embrace sufficiently the commerce of the lakes. As I understand this bill, after some study of its provisions, it covers merely relief as to officers of vessels, wages of seamen, deserting seamen, destitute seamen, seamen's supplies—these are matters of importance in their sphere, but still not of the greatest importance The bill touches further the question of consular fees (proposing to reduce them somewhat), the tonnage tax, the hospital tax, warehousing, unloading after sunset, and the refunding of fines and penalties.

This I believe is the full scope of the bill, and it only touches minor and petty points generally on these subjects of embarrassment to commerce.

Now, sir, upon the lakes we have special interests affected by the embarrassing navigation laws, most of them the outgrowth of legislation in behalf of war taxes, and we have no opportunity to get the benefits we are entitled to in the way of relief unless they are attached to this bill.

One of these elements of which we have occasion largely to complain is the tonnage tax of 30 cents per ton.

Mr. DINGLEY. Allow me to say to the gentleman from New York that I have an amendment to submit on behalf of the committee which will abolish the tonnage tax.

Mr. PARKER. That, then, will be a large benefit. I have not read the amendment to which the gentleman refers, but I trust it will do that, and not only as to Canada, but as to all the waters of all the contiguous territories of Puget Sound, of the Rio Grande, and of the Gulf of Mexico. I will say, however, no more on that, trusting the amendment will be accepted and that it will do all the gentleman suggests.

The next is the hospital tax, which I understand the provisions of this bill will remove entirely, including the lakes. Is not that so?

Mr. DINGLEY. Vessels on the lakes in the foreign trade.

Mr. PARKER. That will be satisfactory with an amendment, and will remove one of these embarrassments to commerce that now exist.

I come to certain minor embarrassments which exist in reference to the item to be paid to collectors of ports. One of these is the entrance fee, another is the clearance fee, another the charges made in ports upon tugs which are at work in local duty. There are several of these specified which are serious embarrassments to commerce. They are intended purely for the purpose of protecting customs duties. In effect they charge upon the commerce of the country the expense of collecting customs duties. I shall offer an amendment at the proper time which will practically reduce many of these charges, to which I trust the committee will make no objection. For instance, on the St. Lawrence River and on the lakes wherever we have commerce with Canada the trips are short, they are multiplied and they are many, and as a consequence entrance and clearance fees are frequently repeated. A ship going out from an ocean port pays its entrance and clearance fees once in eight days, or once in six months, or a year or two years; but here on our northern lakes and St. Lawrence coast a vessel trading between Ogdensburg and Brockville, for instance, has to take out its papers of clearance in leaving port and to pay its entrance fees on entering the port of Brockville, only twelve miles distant. It has again to pay its clearance fee out of Brockville and its entrance fee into Ogdensburg; it has to pay the same each way. These fees are repeated, although the vessel may go backward and forward a dozen times a day. A tug with half a dozen barges making a trip twelve miles is compelled to pay on every barge, although loaded only with lumber or other coarse merchandise, an entrance and clearance fee just the same as though it were a steamship handling a large and valuable cargo. So it is in reference to this tonnage tax and these entrance and clearance fees; they hamper commerce, and especially hamper lake and river commerce because of the short trips run.

Next, I will ask the attention of the House to the consular certificates, in reference to which I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment. In the North there are no consuls on our side sent by the Canadian or British Government, but it is only an expense of our own Government in order to protect the collection of our customs duties. The law requires a vessel going to and fro between the United States and Canada to pay $2.50 for each consular certificate or certified manifest in order to clear and come on its voyage. If the trip is made by a tug hauling barges or canal-boats loaded with lumber or any other rough material the charge of $2.50 has to be paid on every vessel by every consignor for his separate certificate. Every consignor has to pay for his separate certified manifest $2.50 to the consul every time the tug and a half-dozen canal-boats or barges loaded with lumber and coal move from the other side to this, amounting in all, it may be, to a charge of $15 per trip. And for what?

I will challenge any man to show any benefit which is derived by our commerce, our trade, or our business by these charges which we are required to pay. It is simply outrageous to demand them, and at the proper time and in the proper place I shall ask the committee to accept, and if the committee does not accept I shall ask the House to vote for, a proper amendment removing these taxes and restrictions.

Mr. SKINNER, of New York. Let me ask my colleague a question: if his examination of this bill has enabled him to say whether it gives relief to steam-yachts used for pleasure purposes, conveying passengers from one port to another?

Mr. PARKER. I have not examined the bill sufficiently to be able to state whether it covers that point or not. It does not seem to be affected by the bill so far as I have examined, but the gentleman from Maine will be able to give satisfactory information upon the point.

Now, sir, I do not wish to take up the time of the committee any further than to put before it these interests which we have a right to be heard upon, and which we have a right to have acted upon intelligently and fairly, and for the relief of which we have a perfect right to ask. I have no doubt that in the formation of a bill of this character, when such unnecessary and unreasonable restrictions are shown, the proper relief will be granted. And as to the other elements of relief, with reference to our shipping, I am ready to combine with other gentlemen in going very far; and while I may not say that I am prepared to go quite so far as the gentleman from New York himself (though I have in a previous Congress voted perhaps against the majority of my party for his propositions with reference to free ships), yet I say I am willing to go at least a good way with him or any other person who is ready to remove the anomalous and outrageous restrictions upon our commerce.

I believe, sir, that the time has come when public opinion requires, regardless of parties or politics, that something shall be done in this direction, and that it is ready to demand that the embarrassments and burdens existing so long upon our shipping shall be removed, and that this removal shall affect not only the navigation of vessels that sail from the ports of New York and Baltimore or ports in the State of Maine, but also shall relieve the shipping upon our northern frontier.

Mr. FINDLAY. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to make a speech upon this bill, because it comes before the House with the unanimous report of the committee, where all of its provisions have been amply discussed and considered from time to time before the committee reached a conclusion upon it, and for myself I am fully prepared to vote upon the bill without any further consideration.

But the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] made a statement covering an amendment which he says he has in hand, and will offer further on in the consideration of this bill, with reference to the importation of materials which enter into the construction of ships, and which statement on his part I think calls for contradiction upon the spot. That statement, as I understood it, was that all the materials which enter into the construction of a ship in its original composition, as well as all materials which are used for the purpose of repairing a ship afterward, are now subject to such high duty under our existing tariff laws that it is impossible for our ship-builders to import them and make a ship to compete with the iron ship-builders. Now, in response to that I wish to say that since 1872 there has been a law upon the statute-books which provides that all materials of every possible kind which enter into the original construction of a ship, when imported, shall be exempt from duty, and that all materials that are used for the repairs of a vessel, provided it is to be used in the foreign trade, shall be exempt from duty.

Then I understood him to say further that that was a provision that was in some way intended to benefit coastwise vessels or coastwise trade; and that it did not apply to vessels engaged in the foreign trade.

Mr. Speaker, exactly the opposite of that proposition is true, because the limitation in the statute is that these exemptions are made in favor of vessels to be used in the foreign trade. Whenever they are used in the coastwise trade they can only be used for the period of two months in one year. So that upon neither point was the gentleman from New York correct. And in order to set the matter at rest I send up to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read sections 2513 and 2514 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2513. All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, including the trade between the Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, and finished after the 6th day of June, 1872, may be imported in bond, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and, upon proof that such materials have been used for such purpose, no duties shall be paid thereon. But vessels receiving the benefit of this section shall not be allowed to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States more than two months in any one year, except upon the payment to the United States of the duties on which a rebate is herein allowed.

SEC. 2514. All articles of foreign production needed for the repair of American vessels engaged exclusively in foreign trade may be withdrawn from bonded warehouses free of duty, under such regulations as the Secretary of Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. COX, of New York. Allow me one moment, in response to my friend from Maryland, to say that I had a misapprehension when he first interrupted me as to the particular statute he was alluding to. I spoke of the statute covering the 90 per cent. rebate and other matters. But this particular clause, as was said by my friend from Maryland, in the debate last year, and as we all know, had only reference to wooden vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it has reference to these materials which shall be used in the construction and repairs of the vessels.

Mr. COX, of New York. But it did not comprehend all the materials that enter into the construction of iron or steel vessels, and therefore my comprehensive amendment would sweep in the whole by allowing everything of that kind to come in, whether it be used in iron, steel, or wooden vessels. That was the point.

Mr. FINDLAY. I do not know what construction the Secretary of the Treasury has put upon the sections which have been read. But certainly the language "iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails, and bolts," &c., covers articles which enter into the composition of iron vessels, and those are provided for. Let me read the language of the act:

All lumber, timber, hemp, manila, and iron and steel rods, bars, spikes, nails and bolts, and copper and composition metal which may be necessary for the construction and equipment of vessels built in the United States—for the purpose of being employed in the foreign trade, &c.

Not wooden vessels, but "vessels built in the United States"—

And that provision has been in force ever since 1872. We have not availed ourselves of it. Why? Because of the difference of the price of labor in this country and in the Old World.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let me ask the gentleman whether there is any provision there for steel or iron plates?

Mr. FINDLAY. The section provides for "iron and steel rods, bars, spikes," &c., just as I read.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. It does not include iron and steel plates, which are the principal part of the material entering into the construction of an iron vessel.

Mr. HAMMOND. No provision is made for iron and steel plates.

Mr. FINDLAY. Let me say to my friend from Georgia that while that remark may be true so far as the original construction of the vessel is concerned, when you come to the succeeding section, section 2514——

Mr. HAMMOND. But that is confined to repairs and does not relate to the construction of vessels originally.

Mr. FINDLAY. That section which covers the matter of repairs says "all articles of foreign production."

Mr. HAMMOND. That applies to articles of foreign production needed for repairs only.

Mr. FINDLAY. Yes, sir; that section applies to articles needed for repairs. The statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] was that articles we imported from abroad which entered not merely into the original construction of the vessel but which entered into the repairs of a vessel were subject to such high duties under existing tariff laws that we could not build or repair.

Mr. COX, of New York. If the gentleman will allow me I will repeat what has been the construction of the Department, and what we debated here before; what my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] accepted; what came out of a discussion between my friend from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] and gentlemen on both sides. And it is this: that this section had reference entirely to articles which entered into the construction of a wooden ship for the foreign, not the home trade. You remember our discussion about that. It was generally agreed this amendment was necessary. And now I ask my friend from Maryland, if there is any doubt about it, and he desires to have ships, iron, steel, or wooden, built as cheaply as possible, why will he not vote for an amendment which will help the city of Baltimore and its shippers and ship-builders to build their ships more cheaply by the admission of all these materials ruled out by the construction of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. FINDLAY. I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. All right. Then we are on the same side.

Mr. FINDLAY. Not merely that, but I will say to the gentleman I signed the report along with the minority of the committee in favor of buying ships abroad, in favor of free ships. But then I also intended whenever the matter came up for discussion before the House to couple with that a provision that that law should not go into effect for at least two or three years, in the mean time protecting the rights of our own ship-builders here so as to give them a fair chance with foreign builders. In other words, I want to give the most liberal construction to those two sections, and also to carry out such a provision as my friend from New York has suggested. Then if our ship-builders at home could not build a ship in competition with ship-builders abroad, I was ready to say, let us buy ships wherever we can.

Mr. COX, of New York. Why not do both?

Mr. DINGLEY. While I stand there I recognize the fact that we have a bill before us. I recognize the fact that there are other measures before this Congress, and that we are crowded and pressed for time. I recognize the fact that every amendment offered to this bill lessens the chance of the bill passing, owing to the want of time. I therefore stand by the committee because I want to see something done; and rather than not have something done I will oppose any amendment, including even the class of amendments suggested by the gentleman from New York. That is all. It is not because I differ with the gentleman; it is because I am afraid that we may fall between two stools here and get nothing.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will say this in response to the gentleman from Maryland, and I am sure it will not prolong the debate, because it will not be necessary to talk upon it so much in the five-minute debate. I am glad to see that he and myself are like the two colored people in New Orleans who debated a question for two hours and voted on the same side. We are in hearty accord. The gentleman does not want these propositions carried out now on this bill; but I want them carried out now and taken to the Senate. If the Senate does not accept these propositions for free materials and free ships, I am perfectly willing and content to go before the country with such a bill as I can get. I am content to do the best we can to get rid of these minor obstructions on commerce. And I hope the Democratic party and men on the other side, like my friend from the Saint Lawrence district [Mr. PARKER], who have cultivated the liberalities of our party in other days, will join together and make if possible some relief for our ship-owners and ship-builders.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will use the remaining minute for general debate simply for the purpose of saying that I have refrained from replying to the suggestions which have been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] because this bill does not include any of the matters which he has been discussing, and it is the desire of the committee reporting the bill to confine the discussion so far as possible to the matters that are treated of in the bill. Therefore I wish to say that because I do not now take occasion to dissent from some of the things which he has said I do not desire the conclusion to be reached that they are not dissented from by members on this side and many members on the other side. Some other time, when the bill to which he refers shall come before the House, I shall take occasion to express my views on the subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent, general debate on this bill is now closed. No order has been made as to the manner in which the bill shall be considered after the closing of general debate. The Chair supposes that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] intends to ask that the consideration of the bill be now proceeded with under the five-minute rule.

Mr. SLOCUM. That is my proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to considering this bill under the five-minute rule at this time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

The first section of the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the last clause of section 4131 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"All the officers of vessels of the United States shall be citizens of the United States, except that in cases where, on a foreign voyage, or on a voyage from an Atlantic to a Pacific port of the United States, any such vessel is for any reason deprived of the services of an officer below the grade of master, his place, or a vacancy caused by the promotion of another officer to such place, may be supplied by a person not a citizen of the United States until the first return of such vessel to its home port; and such vessel shall not be liable to any penalty or penal tax for such employment of an alien officer."

No amendment was offered.

The second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4580 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4580. Upon the application of the master of any vessel to a consular officer to discharge a seaman, or upon the application of any seaman for his own discharge, if it appears to such officer that said seaman has completed his shipping agreement, or is entitled to his discharge under any act of Congress or according to the general principles or usages of maritime law as recognized in the United States, such officer shall discharge said seaman, and require from the master of said vessel, before such discharge shall be made, payment of the wages which may then be due said seaman; but no payment of extra wages shall be required by any consular officer upon such discharge of any seaman except as provided in this act."

No amendment was offered.

The third section was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 4583 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4583. Whenever on the discharge of a seaman in a foreign country, on his complaint that the voyage is continued contrary to agreement, the consular officer shall be satisfied that such voyage has been designedly and unnecessarily prolonged in violation of the articles of shipment, or whenever a seaman is discharged by a consular officer in consequence of any hurt or injury received in the service of the vessel, such consular officer shall require the payment by the master of one month's wages for such seaman over and above the wages due at the time of discharge."

No amendment was offered.

The fourth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That section 4561 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4561. The inspectors in their report shall also state whether, in their opinion, the vessel was sent to sea unsuitably provided in any important or essential particular, by neglect or design, or through mistake or accident; and in case it was by neglect or design, and the consular officer approves of such finding, he shall discharge such of the crew as request it, and shall require the payment by the master of one month's wages for each seaman over and above the wages then due. But if, in the opinion of the inspectors, the defects or deficiencies found to exist have been the result of mistake or accident, and could not, in the exercise of ordinary care, have been known and provided against before the sailing of the vessel, and the master shall, in a reasonable time, remove or remedy the causes of complaint, then the crew shall remain and discharge their duty."

No amendment was offered.

The fifth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. That section 4582 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4582. Whenever a vessel of the United States is sold in a foreign country, and her company discharged, it shall be the duty of the master to produce to the consular officer the certified list of his ship's company, and also the shipping articles, and to pay to said consular officer for every seaman so discharged one month's wages over and above the wages which may then be due to such seaman; but in case the master of the vessel so sold shall provide said seaman with adequate employment on board some other vessel bound to the port at which he was originally shipped, or to such other port as may be agreed upon by him, then no payment of extra wages shall be required."

The Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests recommend the following amendments:

In line 10 strike out "provide" and insert "with the assent of;" and in line 11, after the word "seaman," insert the words "provide him;" so that it will read:

But in case the master of the vessel so sold shall, with the assent of said seaman, provide him with adequate employment on board some other vessel, &c.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The sixth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 4600 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4600. It shall be the duty of consular officers to reclaim deserters and discountenance insubordination by every means within their power, and where the local authorities can be usefully employed for that purpose, to lend their aid and use their exertions to that end in the most effectual manner. In all cases where deserters are apprehended the consular officer shall inquire into the facts; and if he is satisfied that the desertion was caused by cruel treatment, he shall discharge the seaman, and require the master of the vessel from which such seaman is discharged to pay one month's wages over and above the wages then due; and the officer discharging such seaman shall enter upon the crew-list and shipping-articles the cause of discharge, and the particulars in which the cruelty or unusual treatment consisted, and the facts as to his discharge or re-engagement, as the case may be, and subscribe his name thereto officially."

Mr. SLOCUM. I am instructed by the committee to move to amend the section just read by inserting before the word "cruel," in line 10, the words "unusual or;" so that it will read:

And if he is satisfied that the desertion was caused by unusual or cruel treatment, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The seventh section was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 4581 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4581. If any consular officer, when discharging any seaman, shall neglect to require the payment of and collect the arrears of wages and extra wages required to be paid in the case of the discharge of any seaman, he shall be accountable to the United States to the full amount thereof; and if any seaman shall, after his discharge, have incurred any expense for board or other necessaries at the place of his discharge, before shipping again, or for transportation to the United States, such expense shall be paid out of such arrears of wages and extra wages, which shall be retained for that purpose and the balance only paid over to him."

The amendments recommended by the committee were to strike out "and," in line 7; also, strike out the word "such," in line 12, and insert in lieu thereof the word "the;" and also insert in line 12, after the words "extra wages," the words "received by the consular officer;" so that it will read:

Such expense shall be paid out of the arrears of wages and extra wages received by the consular officer, &c.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I desire to suggest a verbal change in the section. It is to strike out the word "shall" after the word "seaman" in line 8, and to insert the word "shall" before the word "have" in the same line; so that it will read:

If any seaman after his discharge shall have incurred any expense, &c.

Mr. SLOCUM. There is no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move to further amend, in the fourteenth line, by striking out the word "him" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "such seaman;" so that it will read:

The balance only paid over to such seaman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 8 was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That section 4584 of the Revised Statutes be hereby repealed.

No amendment was offered.

Section 9 was read, as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 4578 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4578. All masters of vessels of the United States, and bound to some port of the same, are required to take such destitute seamen on board their vessels, at the request of consular officers, and to transport them to the port in the United States to which such vessel may be bound, on such terms, not exceeding $10 for each person for voyages of not more than thirty days, or not exceeding $20 for each person for longer voyages, as may be agreed between the master and the consular officer; and certificates of transportation shall be assignable; but if any such destitute seaman is so disabled or ill as to be unable to perform duty, the consular officer shall so certify in the certificate of transportation, and such additional compensation shall be paid as the First Comptroller of the Treasury shall deem proper. Every such master who refuses to receive and transport such seaman on the request or order of such consular officer shall be liable to the United States in a penalty of $100 for each seaman so refused. The certificate of any such consular officer, given under his hand and official seal, shall be presumptive evidence of such refusal in any court of law having jurisdiction for the recovery of the penalty. No master of any vessel shall, however, be obliged to take a greater number than one man to every one hundred tons burden of the vessel on any one voyage."

The committee recommend the following amendments:

In line 10 strike out "or" and insert "and;" in line 12, after the word "and," insert the words "said consular officer shall issue;" in the same line strike out "of" and insert the words "for such;" in line 14, after the word "transportation," insert the words "which certificates," and in same line strike out "but" and insert "for collection," so that that portion of the section will read as follows:

"All masters of vessels of the United States, and bound to some port of the same, are required to take such destitute seamen on board their vessels, at the request of consular officers, and to transport them to the port in the United States to which such vessel may be bound, on such terms, not exceeding $10 for each person for voyages of not more than thirty days, and not exceeding $20 for each person for longer voyages, as may be agreed between the master and the consular officer, and said consular officer shall issue certificates for such transportation, which certificates shall be assignable for collection."

The amendments were agreed to.

Section 10 was read, as follows:

SEC. 10. That it shall be, and is hereby, made unlawful in any case to pay to any seaman wages in advance of the time when he has actually earned the same, or to pay such advance wages to any other person, or to pay any person, other than an officer authorized by act of Congress to collect fees for such service, any remuneration for the shipment of seamen. Any person paying such advance wages or such remuneration shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall be punished by a fine not less than four times the amount of the wages so advanced or remuneration so paid, and may be also imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court. The payment of such advance wages or remuneration shall in no case absolve the vessel, or the master or owner thereof, from full payment of wages after the same shall have been actually earned, and shall be no defense to a libel suit, or action for the recovery of such wages: Provided, That this section shall not apply to whaling-vessels: And provided further, That it shall be lawful for any seaman to stipulate in his shipping agreement for an allotment of any portion of the wages which he may earn to his wife, mother, father, grandmother, grandfather, child, grandchild, brother, or to any savings-bank for the benefit of such seaman, but to no other person or corporation. And any person who shall falsely claim such relationship to any seaman in order to obtain wages so allotted shall, for every such offense, be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $500. This section shall apply as well to foreign vessels as to vessels of the United States; and any foreign vessel the master, owner, consignee or agent of which has violated this section, or induced or connived at its violation, shall be refused a clearance from any port of the United States.

The committee recommend the following amendments:

In line 13, after the word "case," insert the words "as herein provided;" in lines 21, 22, and 23, strike out the words "father, grandmother, grandfather, child, brother, or to any savings-bank for the benefit of such seamen," and insert in lieu thereof the words "or other relative;" and after the word "dollars," in line 27, insert the words "or imprisonment not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SLOCUM. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out sections 10 and 11 of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Section 11 has not yet been read. The Clerk will read the section, after which the gentleman can submit his motion.

Section 11 was read, as follows:

SEC. 11. That every vessel mentioned in section 4569 of the Revised Statutes shall also be provided with a slop-chest, which shall contain a complement of clothing for the intended voyage for each seaman employed, including boots or shoes, hats or caps, under clothing and outer clothing, oiled clothing, and everything necessary for the wear of a seaman; also a full supply of tobacco and blankets. Any of the contents of the slop-chest shall be sold, from time to time, to any or every seaman applying therefor, for his own use, at a profit not exceeding 25 per cent. of the reasonable wholesale value of the same at the port at which the voyage commenced. And if any such vessel is not provided, before sailing, as herein required, the owner shall be liable to a penalty of not more than $200.

Mr. SLOCUM. By instructions of the committee I move to strike out sections 10 and 11 of this bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like to hear some reasons for striking out these two sections. The committee seem to have matured them, have presented them to the House, and, as I understand, they are generally accepted by commercial men. I would like to know what new light my friends have received. I think substantially these sections were in the bill of the last session.

Mr. SLOCUM. The committee are in favor of the enactment of the provisions contained in these two sections; they were unanimous on the subject. But the attention of the committee was called by the Secretary of State to the provisions of the tenth section, beginning with line 29. I will ask the Clerk to read the comments of the Secretary of State on that section which have induced the committee to recommend that sections 10 and 11 be stricken out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. Particular attention is called to lines 29 to 33 which extend the penalties to foreign vessels as well as to our own. I am of the opinion that we have no right to interfere with masters of foreign vessels in the matter of the shipment of their crews.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection——

Mr. COX, of New York. There is objection to striking out the provision. I want to hear some good reason for doing so (if there is any) besides that given by the Department of State. I do not see why we have not control over these foreign ships in our ports; why we can not establish these police regulations connected with this business. I think the first thought of the committee was wisest and best. If you strike out this humane provision there will be hardly anything in this bill worth having, very little at any rate so far as we have gone. I hope the committee will retain what seems to be a most valuable provision according to our humanitarian views about sailors.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Why would not the criticism of the Secretary of State be met by striking out the last clause of the section?

Mr. DINGLEY. That would make a serious discrimination against American vessels. If that were done, foreign vessels could ship their crews in our ports at a great advantage over American vessels. Unless the provision be applicable to foreign as well as American vessels, it ought not to be adopted at all.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would like my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to say whether our pilotage dues, our light-house dues, and all these various other exactions are not made applicable to foreign ships.

Mr. DINGLEY. But they apply to foreign vessels in the same manner as to American.

Mr. COX, of New York. I would not discriminate between the two classes of vessels.

Mr. DINGLEY. I understand that the opinion of the Secretary of State is founded on the principle of the comity of nations, that under this principle one nation regards the vessel of another within its ports as practically foreign territory, and therefore leaves such vessel to ship its seamen according to the laws of its own nationality.

Mr. COX, of New York. With all respect to my friend from Maine, and the Department of State, I believe our laws can reach foreign vessels in our ports.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will observe I do not say whether I accept the reasoning of the Secretary of State; but I understand that is the ground upon which his suggestion is made.

Mr. COX, of New York. But I believe I have heard the gentleman from Maine say heretofore that he could answer the reasoning of the Secretary of State. I think he is paring down his bill too far and too much. I am sure my friend the chairman of the committee [Mr. SLOCUM] will confirm what I say.

Why, sir, some two or three years ago a bill introduced by myself was passed in this House—and it has not been contested—requiring foreign steamers leaving our ports to be provided with the same sort of life-saving appliances and to undergo the same inspection as our own vessels. Why not? I would put the foreign and American vessels on a parity in this respect. Why discriminate against our own and in favor of foreign vessels? When our vessels go into the port of Liverpool or Southampton the English laws operate upon them and are executed. Why can we not do the same thing and make our laws applicable to foreign vessels in the ports of New York, Boston, Baltimore, or Galveston? How can we administer our laws in regard to immigrants, how can we mitigate the austerities and horrors of the "middle passage," unless the laws of our States and the Federal Congress apply to foreign vessels coming to this country to trade? They have all the advantages of commerce with this country; let them take the burdens also equally with our own vessels.

This argument about the comity of nations comes naturally from a polite department, the Department of State. I would rather accept suggestions from the Treasury Department, where there is not so much sauvity and comity and nice diplomatic usage and phraseology. Let us look after our own vessels and at the same time enforce reciprocity with reference to vessels coming into our harbors from abroad.

Mr. DIBBLE. As a member of the committee I concur very fully in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX]. He has stated more eloquently than I could have done some of the reasons which induced a minority of the committee to withhold concurrence from the recommendation to strike out these clauses of the bill.

In reference to a vessel of one nation in the port of another, it is a matter of dispute, in which able admiralty lawyers differ, as to how far the sovereignty of the vessel's flag prevails against the municipal regulations of the port of another nation which such vessel has entered. As to the distinction attempted to be applied to foreign vessels in the concluding provision of the tenth section, it is the opinion of one of the ablest admiralty lawyers in this country, I understand, that provisions as to advance wages can be enforced against foreign vessels in American ports as well as against domestic vessels. While the foreign vessel is under the flag of its own country, still it takes upon and from American soil the seamen it ships, and in many instances takes citizens of the United States as such seamen. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope the sections will not be stricken out.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the tenth section was read it struck me that the last few lines were open to some question. The question is merely how far the law will enable us to go. But if it is desirable to control the masters of American vessels in this respect, we can safely adopt this section, leaving it for the courts to decide how wide may be its application. I think it would be questionable policy to take out of this bill a provision in regard to American vessels (if that provision is admitted to be a good one) simply because there is some question of law as to whether it can apply to foreign vessels in our ports.

But, Mr. Speaker, the reason I rise now is to ask why, if the Secretary of State objects to a few lines of section 10, we therefore should strike out of this bill section 11? It may be that there is a logical connection between the two sections; that is to say, seamen before they begin their voyage are defrauded by land-sharks in port, but that is no reason why we should not compel American ships to carry a slop-chest, and therefore take away part of the motive that seamen have to waste their advance wages, that waste, extravagance, and liability to fraud being the motive for taking away the right to advance wages altogether. Admitting we should not prohibit the payment of advance wages, should we not as far as we can take away that motive in the mind of the sailor which renders the payment of advance wages an abuse? Why should we not compel the ship to give him at a reasonable rate those articles the purchase of which at unreasonable rates forms the abuse mentioned in section 10?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. DINGLEY. It is perhaps due to the House the question presented in this proposition should be a little better understood. Even admitting, according to the opinion given by the Secretary of State, we have no right to apply the provision to foreign vessels, I wish to say in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois that to strike out that part of this section which applies the provision to foreign vessels, leaving it bearing on American vessels alone, would work a serious discrimination against American vessels and ought not to be done.

Now, as to the point of advance wages, there is no difference of opinion in the committee or among the friends of the American merchant marine, or I may say on the part of the merchant marine of any country in the world, if any provision of law can be devised which can be executed to forbid the payment of advance wages to seamen that it would work a great good to the seamen of the merchant marine. The law of the United States to-day goes a long distance in reference to prohibiting the payment of advance wages. It forbids the payment of advance wages to any person but the seaman himself. That is the state of the law to-day; but this bill undertakes to go further and to prohibit the payment of advance wages even to the seaman himself. Now England has tried legislation in this direction. She has been legislating for more than fifteen years to break up the practice of paying advance wages to seamen for the reason the seamen are so much under the control of sailor landlords that the moment they obtain their wages they go into the hands of these sailor landlords. England has legislated and amended her law from time to time, but the sailor landlords in every instance have been able to get around whatever provision it has enacted. I hold in my hand a communication from the United States consul at Liverpool, giving some information as to the working of the British law, of which this is in some measure a copy. It is as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Liverpool, April 28, 1883.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 31st March in reference to the recent act of Parliament which prohibits the payment of advance wages in the British merchant-marine service.

From inquiries made I gather that the law in the main is evaded, and therefore is not beneficial to the ship-owners nor satisfactory to the seamen.

By the act of Parliament referred to advances were made illegal, and the deduction of such from the seamen's wages at the time of his discharge was made unlawful.

To evade the law and keep the system actually in force the ship-owners now issue bonus notes promising to pay an amount equal to one or two months' wages, as the case may be, in consideration that the seaman sails in the ship, the sum stated to be paid by way of bonus and not on account of wages. When the seaman receives the bonus note he signs a paper the purport of which is that he has received the amount in cash, clothes, board, &c., the same to be deducted from his wages.

I append a copy of such bonus note, with receipt.

Another practice is to have the seaman sign articles at the rate of 1*s.* for the first month (or for the first two months, where advance is to be given, as in the case of long voyages), and give him a memorandum credit, which the sailor may negotiate with his boarding-master for the difference between the 1*s.* and what the actual wages would have been, usually £2 10*s.* per month. This latter method of evading the law seems now to be preferred.

There can be no doubt that the law at present is systematically evaded, and has become a dead letter as far as advances are concerned.

It was thought that the new law would encourage seamen to take more care of their earnings when discharged and so enable them to ship again without advance, but so far such has not been the result, the proportion of seamen shipping without really receiving advance not being greater than under the old system.

The ship-owners and seamen appear to agree that the new law is not to their interest and would gladly return to the old one again.

Yours, very respectfully,

S. B. PACKARD, Consul.

BONUS NOTE.

To ——— ———: In consideration of your signing articles and sailing in the ship ——— on her next voyage from ———, I undertake to pay to you, or to such person as you shall name by writing, by indorsement on this agreement, the sum of £— by way of bonus and not on account of wages, such sum to be paid ten days after ship's sailing.

Dated this —— day of ———, 188-.

———— ————,

Owner or agent of the above-mentioned ship.

[Copy of memorandum credit.]

LIVERPOOL, ——— 188-.

Received from Captain ——— ———, ship ———, the sum of £— in cash, clothes, board, &c. The same to be deducted from my wages account.

———— ————.

Witness: ——— ———.

As will be seen, it is there stated that the English have been unable to enforce their law, as by various devices the sailor landlords were able to get around the law. It has been productive of more harm than good.

There is therefore this view of the question joined to the suggestion of the Secretary of State, which leads me seriously to question whether we are prepared to-day to vote on the provision contained in this section. Having presented the points which seem to me to bear upon it, I am prepared to concur in whatever may be most agreeable to the members of the House.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he sits down.

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. He perhaps did not notice that my chief point was that admitting—and I do admit—there is some question about the possibility of enforcing section 10, is it not desirable to retain in the bill section 11, which provides ships shall keep a slop-chest and sell at reasonable rates those articles the purchase of which at unreasonable rates is a part of the abuse we have under discussion.

Mr. DINGLEY. In answer to the gentleman I will say the law as it exists at present obliges vessels to carry slop-chests, and provides a certain class of articles shall be carried, but it does not go so far as is proposed in this section, and there is not a sufficient penalty. There would be no objection to including section 11 even if the preceding section be voted down. I wish to say for myself I am entirely content to accept whatever view the House may take of the question.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of more sedately vindicating the position I took awhile ago with reference to this subject. I made some investigation of this proposition on a bill to which I then referred, and I will now call the attention of the House briefly to the law in this case.

The proposition as laid down by writers upon the law of nations covering the exact point in controversy is—

That the jurisdiction of the nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute. It is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself.

That you will find laid down in Wheaton, page 140, in which he quotes from the decision of Chief-Justice Marshall as giving him the predicate for what follows. Then it is laid down further that the right of one nation to carry on a commerce with another is not a natural right, but has its foundation in treaty—

And relates to that branch of the law of nations termed conventional. The treaty that gives the right of commerce is the measure and rule of that right. Every nation has the right to choose whether she will or will not trade with another, and on what conditions she is willing to do it. If one nation has for a time permitted another to come and trade in the country, she is at liberty whenever she thinks proper to prohibit that commerce, to restrain it, to subject it to certain regulations; and the people who before carried it on can not complain of injustice.

That is laid down in Vattel's Law of Nations, page 40, and also in Wheaton's Law of Nations, in which various treaties are recited.

It will be seen, sir, that this, in the language of Vattel, "depends upon the option of a nation to annex any additions it may be see fit to the admission of foreign vessels into its ports, whether they be public or private."

That right is clearly laid down by all writers on international law.

It is a principle of the English rule under the common-law system that "the king is lord of the whole shore, and particularly is he the guardian of the ports and havens which are the inlets and gates of the realm." And in England all the great paths of the sea were established by the statutes of 4 Henry IV, chapter 20, which prohibited the landing elsewhere under pain of confiscation. This will be found by reference to 1 Blackstone, 263. The same rule prevails in this country, wherein by our statutes foreign vessels are prohibited from discharging their cargoes at any port unless it be designated by law as a port of entry, and the local laws for the regulation of ports apply alike to domestic and foreign vessels. This is covered by our statutes, No. 2771 et seq.

Owing to the fact that life was in danger, in peril, by these tramps of the seas bringing immigrants to our shores, we undertook, by a law passed two years ago, to inspect all of these foreign vessels. They made complaint to the Department, these steamship companies, stating that they were unduly subjected to police regulations. But that was not said for the better class of vessels, because it was to their interest to have the vessels, these tramps of the sea, which promised to run riot on the sea and disturb the decency of the exchange of passengers and freight, inspected and brought under proper regulations. And so it comes to this, as established by the law of nations almost from time immemorial, by the laws of international justice, by the best writers and all good thinkers, and by the sovereignty and territoriality of a people, that we have the same right in our ports to make regulations for the admission of any vessels of foreign nations as the Government of Great Britain has to make regulations for our ships which enter at her ports. One of the recognized duties of the Government is the preservation of the life and health of its citizens; upon this all writers agree, and public safety and sanitary laws are common to the statutes of all civilized countries.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to find out, and perhaps some gentleman on the committee who has this bill in charge will be kind enough to answer the question, which will obviate the necessity for offering an amendment which I had prepared, whether it was intended by gentlemen of the committee that the provisions of section 11 of this bill will apply to vessels engaged in commerce on the great lakes?

Mr. DINGLEY. It will not.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. It occurs to me upon a brief reference to that statute that it will.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no objection to an amendment which will make it clear, if the gentleman wishes to offer one.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Of course vessels engaged in the navigation of the great lakes, as, for instance, between the ports of Michigan and the ports of Canada or other points, when on short voyages, are subject to these restrictions. I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an amendment which is calculated to remedy the trouble.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to correct my answer? I supposed he was referring to another section. This section applies to all vessels.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Section 11 should not apply to all vessels. I propose to add to the section what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The provisions of this section shall not apply to vessels navigating the great lakes or the waters connecting the same.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I think also the words should be added "on the river Saint Lawrence."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Michigan that before that amendment can be put there is an amendment proposed to that section by the committee, which must first be disposed of. The Chair will entertain the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan at the proper time.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I will offer it hereafter.

Mr. HUNT rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] withdraw the formal amendment?

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is recognized.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I had not surrendered the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan will proceed. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Louisiana later.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. While I am on the floor I desire to add a word in favor of the amendments to be submitted to section 12 by my friend from New York. Under the provisions of the existing statutes it would seem as if there had been a set purpose to legislate against the vessels navigating the great lakes of the Northwest on the right hand and on the left. They are embarrassed by the constant levying of fees. Port dues, tonnage dues, hospital dues, and all sorts of exactions and penalties are imposed on these vessels, and for what purpose I have never been able to understand. I see no good purpose subserved by any such policy, and I hope the time has come when that portion of our commerce can be relieved of these exactions and of these burdens.

I will make one further remark, as perhaps this is all I shall have to say on this bill, and it is this: Standing here on the floor of this House a protective-tariff man, yet am I so interested in the building up of the merchant marine of the United States that I will vote for a bill which shall relieve our shipping of all these burdens, of all dues, and I will favor the enactment of a law which shall authorize Americans to purchase ships abroad. I am entirely in favor of free ships and the relieving of our merchant marine of all these various exactions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. HUNT] is recognized.

Mr. HUNT. I do not claim the floor at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendments reported by the committee to section 11, perfecting the text, should first be voted upon before the motion to strike out is entertained.

The amendments proposed by the committee to section 11 were agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope the chairman of the committee will withdraw the motion to strike out those two sections.

Mr. SLOCUM. The proposal to strike out these two sections was made out of deference to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of State. The committee were unanimous in their judgment in reporting those sections when the bill was framed, and they would be glad to see them kept in now. They believe both sections are represented. The proposal to strike out was only made through deference to the Secretary of State. We are willing the House should decide as to that without respect to the recommendation made by the committee. I therefore withdraw the motion, leaving it in the hands of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is then upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HATCH], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 11 the following:

"The provisions of this section shall not apply to vessels navigating the great lakes, or the waters connecting the same, or the river Saint Lawrence."

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest the addition, "or any vessels in the United States engaged in the coastwise trade."

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. I accept that and will make it a part of my amendment.

Mr. DIBBLE. I desire to add also after the words "river Saint Lawrence" the words "or the Gulf of Mexico."

Mr. COX, of New York. If there is an exception made of the navigation of the Saint Lawrence, the Gulf of Mexico, the lakes, and the coast, the Mississippi River also and everything should be excepted.

Mr. DINGLEY. The coastwise trade includes the Mississippi River.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. Is there a foreign trade on the Mississippi River?

Mr. DINGLEY. No, sir.

Mr. HATCH, of Michigan. There is at New Orleans. I accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE].

Mr. DIBBLE. The only thing I have to say in support of my amendment is that there is no necessity for a slop-chest with so many articles in it for a vessel navigating the Gulf of Mexico. In crossing the ocean there is a necessity for it in some cases. That is the distinction.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It has occurred to me if the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina be adopted it might exclude some vessels you do not want to exclude, vessels starting from the Gulf of Mexico to foreign ports, while those you want to exclude, those going across the Gulf, are included in the words "engaged in the coastwise trade." I think the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina is unnecessary and injurious.

Mr. DIBBLE. The words "engaged in the coastwise trade" would not apply to vessels starting from a port in the Gulf of Mexico and going to a port in Cuba, for instance. It is but ninety miles from Key West to Havana, and I suggest on such a voyage they do not want a slop-chest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HATCH] has accepted the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] as a part of his own. The question is on the amendment as thus modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. I desire to offer an amendment to come in as a new section before section 12.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better wait until we reach the end of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. There are other amendments which I desire to offer, the nature of which are such that I must submit this amendment here or lose the right to make them by the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that an amendment must be germane to either section 11 or section 12 to be in order at this place.

Mr. REED. And new sections must be offered at the end of the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. New sections must be put in at the end of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. I submit to the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend section 11 by adding that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

And that all laws or parts of laws requiring the payment of any remuneration to the shipping commissioner for the shipping of seamen, if shipped by said master or owner, be and the same are hereby repealed: Provided, That the duties of ship commissioners at home ports shall be performed by collectors of the several ports of the United States, and that no fees shall be charged for said services.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the section does not relate to shipping commissioners.

Mr. COX, of New York. It has reference to the shipping of seamen.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no reference to shipping of seamen in section 11.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that the proposed amendment would be more appropriate at the end of the bill as a new section.

Mr. COX, of New York. Is it too late to offer an amendment to section 10 of this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. COX, of New York. I ask consent to offer an amendment to section 10.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman to reserve his amendment until the end of the bill is reached.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will do so if there is no point made on it then.

Section 12 was read, as follows:

SEC. 12. That on and after July 1, 1884, no fees shall be charged or collected by consular officers for the official services to American vessels and seamen named in the tariff of consular fees prescribed by order of the President. Consular officers shall furnish the master of every such vessel with an itemized statement of such services performed on account of said vessel, with the fee so prescribed for each service, and make a detailed report to the Secretary of the Treasury of such services and fees, under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow consular officers who are paid in whole or in part by fees such compensation for said services as they would have received prior to the passage of this act.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

In line 2, after the word "fees," insert the words "named in the tariff of consular fees prescribed by order of the President;" and in lines 5 and 6, after the word "seaman," strike out the words "named in the tariff of consular fees prescribed by order of the President."

Mr. DINGLEY. That is merely a transposition of a phrase.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER. I offer as a substitute for section 12 as amended that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That on and after July 1, 1884, no fees named in the tariff of consular fees prescribed by order of the President shall be charged or collected by consular officers for the official services to American vessels and seamen, or for the services specified in section 2851 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, so far as the same is applicable to merchandise shipped in vessels owned by American citizens and coming from adjacent foreign territory. Consular officers shall furnish the master of every such vessel with an itemized statement of such services performed on account of said vessel and its cargo with the fee so prescribed for each service, and make a detailed report to the Secretary of the Treasury of such services and fees, under such regulations as the Secretary of State may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall allow consular officers who are paid in whole or in part by fees such compensation for said services as they would have received prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order on that substitute that as far as it provides for the abolition of fees for invoices it is not germane to the bill. Invoice fees are charges upon the importation of goods, and are a part of the customs laws, and have nothing to do with the vessel.

Mr. PARKER. I submit that the point of order will not lie against this amendment. The bill which the committee has presented here is a bill entitled "A bill to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and encourage the American foreign trade." Now, I suppose that anything which will come under these two specifications is germane to this bill.

The gentlemen who framed this bill and the gentlemen here who have heard it read and discussed know that repeatedly in the progress of the discussion reference has been made to consular action, consular fees, consular charges, and the duties performed by consuls. The section under consideration is a section to mitigate consular fees; that is all there is of it. I propose to add another item of consular fees to those which are included in this section. The subject of this section is the mitigation of consular fees. Therefore another item of consular fees which it is found bears heavily upon our shipping is germane to the section under consideration.

The fees to which my amendment refers are the fees specified in section 2851 of the Revised Statutes. They are also fees which are specified in the order referred to by the committee in this section "named in the tariff of consular fees prescribed by the order of the President." It is one of the very fees prescribed by the President, and therefore one of the fees which this section proposes to abolish.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read section 2851 of the Revised Statutes mentioned in the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

For every verification of an invoice and certificate before a consul or commercial agent, such consul or commercial agent shall be entitled to demand and receive from the person making the same a fee of $2.50. But each shipper shall have the right to include all articles shipped by him in the same invoice.

Mr. DINGLEY. Further upon the point of order, I desire to say that this bill, including the present section, proposes to relieve the American merchant marine from certain burdens. Invoices for the shipment of goods are not burdens imposed on any vessel. They are simply a part of the customs regulations of the country. Shippers abroad are required to verify their invoices before American consuls, and the amount of fees received from this source last year was more than $700,000. Therefore the amendment opens an entirely new question—a question which addresses itself to fees arising from our customs regulations, not a dollar of which is paid by any vessel.

Mr. DIBBLE. Section 2851 of the Revised Statutes comes under Title XXXIV, Collection of Duties. The section of this bill which it is now proposed to amend deals simply with such fees in the tariff of consular fees as pertain to the ships and to the masters of vessels—matters connected with the subject of this bill. In the collection of customs duties, a matter entirely beyond the jurisdiction of the Committee on Shipping, it is necessary that the consul or consular agent should verify invoices for the shipment of goods to this country. These fees to which the amendment of the gentleman from New York relates can therefore have no possible connection with this bill. If he had introduced a bill proposing to abolish section 2851 of the Revised Statutes it would not have been referred to the Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, but to the Committee on Ways and Means. This shows, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is in no way germane to the subject-matter now under consideration.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Upon the question of order I wish to say that I made an elaborate argument in this House in favor of the abolition of the fees which my colleague [Mr. PARKER] now proposes to abolish; but my proposition was to abolish them on goods shipped in foreign as well as domestic vessels. I prepared an amendment for this purpose to be offered to this bill; but upon investigation I concluded, as the amendment related to the collection of customs, not to offer it upon this bill. I will, however, say to my colleague that in a bill which I have now prepared and which is under consideration in the Committee on Ways and Means it is proposed to abolish these fees, thus effecting the object he desires to accomplish.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then I make a further point of order, that this amendment is the substance of another bill pending in the House.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. No, sir; the bill has never been introduced in this House; it is merely under consideration for report to the House. Hence the point of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will not stand.

Mr. PARKER. I feel at liberty to say only a word more. I regret the alacrity and activity with which the committee seems inclined to object to everything beyond what they have already agreed upon. I doubt very much whether, with a view to the success of the bill, it is best to be too strict in the consideration of amendments in the House.

But I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the further suggestion that in the consular regulations (a copy of which I hold in my hand) the item to which I refer is included in the "tariff of consular fees prescribed by order of the President," which is the specific and only object of this section. The language of the consular regulations is:

No. 36. Invoice, including declaration in triplicate, $2.50.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is not a service to the vessels, but a service to the shippers of goods.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My colleague [Mr. PARKER] will allow me to say that what he has read is included in the list for convenience. But the President has no discretionary power as to fees on invoices. That matter is regulated by statute. He has a discretionary power as to services rendered to ships. That is the distinction.

Mr. PARKER. If I felt sure or could have the assurance of my colleague that the bill to which he refers will certainly come before the House for definite action, I should be in a measure reconciled to a ruling against this amendment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I give my colleague the assurance that if I can procure a favorable report I will do so. But I can not pledge the Committee on Ways and Means to report any bill that has not yet received their sanction.

Mr. PARKER. I must ask the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order, insisting that for the reasons I have stated the amendment is germane to this section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the point of order is well taken. That portion of the proposed substitute which differs from the text of this bill proposes to repeal the fee which may be collected by a consul under section 2851 of the Revised Statutes. That fee is an imposition upon the shipper of merchandise to this country, and may be collected by the consul from the person proposing to ship the goods. The bill under consideration is a bill "to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine, and encourage the American foreign carrying trade." The amendment does not relate to burdens upon ships, but to fees to be paid by shippers, and is therefore not germane to this section.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I offer the amendment which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to section 12 the following:

"But not to exceed in the aggregate in any fiscal year the amount of fees collected at each consulate for such services during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883."

Mr. DINGLEY. That amendment, I believe, is satisfactory to me.

Mr. SLOCUM. The committee, I think, are ready to accept that amendment.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] whether the words "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883," ought not to be omitted, because this bill is to run from year to year.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The object of that phrase is to furnish a measure of the compensation of the consul.

Mr. DINGLEY. But will not that measure apply also to years which are to come?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. My object is that the fees collected for this service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, shall be the measure of compensation for all years to come.

Mr. DINGLEY. But suppose the business in any port should largely increase in the future?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I admit hereafter it will be subject to correction. What I wish to say is this—this is a proposition the House had better understand. The reason why I offer the amendment——

Mr. DINGLEY. Suppose you put in the words "for the prior fiscal year," so that if the business of the port should increase quadruple for instance——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I say the limit of the last year, and for the reason which I will explain to the House. We have abolished by this provision all fees, and as a matter of course the captain of a ship will do everything for the consul. He will go to him on every possible occasion and there will be a fee not to be paid by the ship but by the United States, and the result will be there will be collusion between captains of ships and consuls piling up these fees to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. If we make the fees received at a consulate during the last fiscal year the gauge of his fees and he can not get any more, there can not be any possible collusion. It is to avoid extravagance and abuse, which would result from innumerable services captains would be glad to render occasion for on the part of consuls where the fees would have to be paid out of the Treasury and not paid by the ship.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am in accord with the object the gentleman from New York has in view; but it should be borne in mind the fees are limited to the service prescribed by the proclamation of the President. There can be but one service of a kind for each vessel.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. While the vessel will now only get one of these services, the captain may go and get the whole of them. There is a list of thirty-odd fees, and he would be years having to pay any more. The captain in collusion with the consul would go and have the whole thirty-six rendered, whereas now he will have only one or two.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the proposition of the gentleman?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. To limit the compensation of each consul to the fees collected in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883. When business increases hereafter it will be necessarily subject to new legislation, but in the mean time there is a liability to gross abuse unless this amendment is adopted.

Mr. DINGLEY. So long as this is a tentative proposition, to be followed I trust with some provision of law fixing a definite salary for every consul——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I agree that ought to be done.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know there is an objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Section 13 was read, as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 4213 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4213. It shall be the duty of all masters of vessels for whom any official services shall be performed by any consular officer without the payment of a fee to require a written statement of such services from such consular officer, and after certifying as to whether such statement is correct to furnish it to the collector of the district in which such vessels shall first arrive on their return to the United States; and if any such master of a vessel shall fail to furnish such statement he shall be liable to a fine of not exceeding $50, unless such master shall state under oath that no such statement was furnished him by said consular officer. And it shall be the duty of every collector to forward to the Secretary of the Treasury all such statements as shall have been furnished to him, and also a statement of all certified invoices which shall come to his office, giving the dates of the certificates and the names of the persons for whom and of the consular officer by whom the same were certified."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no amendment proposed, the Clerk will read section 14.

Section 14 was read, as follows:

SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum heretofore imposed by law, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from the West India Islands or the Bermuda Islands, or from any port or place in the Republic of Mexico, or from any place south of Mexico down to and including Aspinwall and Panama, or from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland, or from the Sandwich Islands; and a duty of 6 cents per ton is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign port: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal sections 2793 and 4220 of the Revised Statutes: And provided further, That the vessels herein named which shall have paid their tonnage tax for the current year, as heretofore provided, shall not be liable to the tax herein levied until the expiration of the certificate of last payment of said tax. And sections 4223 and 4224, and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section, are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the words "port or" before the word "place," in line 8.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DUNN. I move to strike out the section and substitute for it what I send up to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 14 and substitute the following:

"That from and after the 1st day of September next no duties upon the tonnage of foreign vessels or vessels of the United States shall be levied by virtue of sections 4219, 4223, 4224, and 4225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, except such foreign vessels as enter from ports into which vessels of the United States are not permitted to enter for trade; and except, further, the vessels of such foreign nations as impose discriminating duties on the vessels of the United States.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, this substitute proposes to absolutely abolish all the tonnage tax on foreign vessels as well as on vessels of the United States, subject to the exceptions named in the substitute. The tonnage tax collected as I am informed (and I do not pretend to be accurate on this point) is $1,300,000 per annum—$300,000 on American, and $1,000,000 on foreign vessels. All will admit that all taxation accumulates on the objects of taxation and is at last paid by the consumer. The great trouble of the American shipping interest is it is loaded down with onerous burdens of taxation under which it is impossible to continue prosperously and profitably.

This tax was entirely repealed in 1829, and, as I am informed, was never revived until after the war began in 1861. It is a war tax. There is no necessity for it. No people in any country in this world are willing to pay a tax unless there is a necessity for it, however inconsiderable the tax may be; and the feeling of the American people of to-day is in favor of the entire repeal of all unnecessary taxes. The modification, the reduction of excessive taxation is demanded. While we can not hope by this kind of an amendment alone to revive American shipping and set our people in successful competition with the shipping interests of other countries by giving them a standing among the commercial nations of the world such as they once had, it is a measure which will remove a small burden at the expense of a small sum from the Treasury which is not needed there.

The gentleman from New York, in all of his long and useful experience in this House, never gave more wholesome advice than he has given to-day in the direction of the restoration of American shipping. He stated all of the conditions needed, except, in my judgment, one single one, which he overlooked. He said, "Give us free registration for ships bought abroad; give us free material for the construction of ships in our own yards, not only ships for foreign trade and market but for our own domestic trade and market." If he had said, "Give also such freedom of trade throughout the world as will enable these ships to secure cargoes wherever they can find them, to be brought profitably to our own ports," he would have stated the whole case and all of the conditions that are required. It will be in vain that we make free ships and free material so long as trade and commerce are fettered and burdened with war-tariff taxation which amounts to prohibition as to a vast volume of trade that would be possible under more favorable conditions. There will never be a revival of American shipping until there is something for American shipping to do profitably.

It is these burdens of taxation of all kinds, great and small, taxes upon every element that enters into the shipping interest, that are bearing it down; taxation upon the commodities that must form the cargoes of the ships as well as upon the material of which the ships are built—all of these are what have destroyed American shipping. Our shipping interests have gone down as taxation has gone up, and in the exact ratio.

And now if taxation is high from the necessities of a great war, so our shipping interest is as low as these burdens can possibly depress it. It has absolutely been driven from the seas; and I favor the policy of removing every burden upon trade and commerce wherever it may be found and in whatever shape it exists. It is but a small sum in this case, about $1,300,000. It is a mere bagatelle to the Treasury, but it is a great burden upon our feeble shipping interests, all tending in the direction of crushing and destroying it.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas is an exceedingly important one, and ought to receive the most careful attention of this House. It is practically a proposition to abolish the tonnage tax on the vessels of all nations except those of Spain, which is the only nation that maintains a discriminating charge against American vessels.

It proposes to abolish a tax which last year yielded to us $1,320,500, of which amount $1,057,961 was paid by foreign vessels and only $262,539 by American vessels. It is a proposition, therefore, to remit over $1,000,000 of tax on foreign vessels and but $260,000 on American vessels. And it proposes to do that without in the first instance securing from foreign nations an abolition of the tax imposed upon American vessels. For example, to-day England imposes in the shape of light-dues taxes upon American vessels which amount to 12 cents per ton. We impose an equivalent tax, which we call a tonnage tax, of 30 cents per year. But the bill which is under consideration proposes to reduce that tax to 6 cents for each entry. If this amendment should be adopted English steamers, for example, making ten trips a year to our ports will be admitted to all of the ports of this country without charge as to rate of duty or tonnage tax. They will be allowed to come in free of tax; but the American vessels of the Philadelphia line, for instance, which make regular trips to Liverpool, will be charged 12 cents per ton on every entry at that port, or $1.20 per ton per year.

The proposition therefore is, as I have said, to admit British and other foreign vessels without any light-house duty or tonnage tax, but allow at the same time Great Britain to tax American vessels 12 cents per ton on each entry, or if they be steamships, $1.20 per ton per year. That seems to be a very serious objection to the amendment.

Now, I am in favor of the abolition of the tonnage tax on certain conditions, namely: that that tax shall also be abolished, or all equivalent taxes, on American vessels which are now imposed by foreign nations. Otherwise I should object to it, and I think the objection is and will be a serious one if the House will consider it. Because for this House to vote to abolish all this tax upon foreign vessels and still leave the foreign nations to impose their taxes upon our vessels seems to me to be the most unwise and unnecessary legislation that could be proposed. On the contrary, if we are to take steps in that direction let us continue the tonnage tax and arrange to apply it as England arranges her light-house tax, and then authorize the President to suspend the collection of the tax as to the vessels of other nations which abolish the tax as to our own.

Mr. DUNN. What is the necessity? Do we need the revenue? Does the Government need the revenue derived from this source?

Mr. DINGLEY. But if the Government is to remit the revenue derived from this source to foreign vessels, it ought to get something in return. It ought not to give this to foreign vessels and at the same time allow foreign nations to tax our vessels. It would be better to say to foreign nations: "If you will relieve our vessels we will relieve yours."

Mr. DUNN. My idea is, every burden of taxation we put on their tonnage is simply an addition to the cost of what they deliver to us, and is paid by our consumers and is a tax on our own people, not on them.

Mr. DINGLEY. If so, then there is an additional reason for getting reduced the large taxes paid by vessels which enter the ports of Great Britain—12 cents a ton. This proposes only 6 cents, half the British rate. Let us do this so as to induce foreign nations to take their burdens from us, and not relieve foreign vessels to the extent of a million dollars when we only relieve American vessels to the extent of $260,000, without saying to them, "We will relieve you on condition you will relieve our vessels." That is my objection to the amendment.

Allow me further to say the committee propose to change the mode of collecting the tonnage tax so as to collect it for each entry. That should be the rule. It is the rule which England adopts in levying her light-house tax. In doing so we especially relieve our vessels. Nine-tenths, yes, fifteen-sixteenths of the American vessels engaged in foreign trade are sailing vessels. A large proportion of them make but one entry a year, and they are taxed under existing laws 30 cents a ton for each entry, whereas an English steamer comes in ten times a year for only 30 cents. That is to say, we tax our own vessels 30 cents a ton and the British steamer only 3 cents a ton on each entry. The committee propose to change the mode of levying the tax so as to levy it at each entry. And then they are willing, after making that arrangement, to say to foreign nations: "If you will take off the tax on American vessels in your ports, we then and on that condition will take the tax off yours."

Mr. ELLIS. I move to strike out the last word.

The American Congress is to-day face to face with a subject which in my judgment is the most important which can engage its consideration—a bill to remove certain burdens upon American shipping. As that interest lies stranded and desolate, with only its glorious memories about it, it must be lightened, it must be relieved, and everything which tends to hold it in its present stranded position must be taken off.

I support the amendment of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]. The only argument against it that has fallen from the lips of my learned and distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] is based on the lex talionis—the law of retaliation. And everybody knows that law always injures the weaker. Why? A tax of $300,000 upon the American merchant marine is equivalent to a tax of $3,000,000 upon the British merchant marine, so great is the difference between their tonnage.

Now, what does the amendment of my friend from Arkansas propose? It proposes to remit a million of dollars of taxation which we do not need; for our chief political problem to-day is to get rid of our surplus revenue. Then we do not need it for revenue. We are endeavoring to get rid of the excess of revenue, and we do not need it for that purpose.

This is following the line of the legislation of 1829, when the American Congress repealed the tonnage tax—repealed it, as I am informed, unconditionally, and the result was most beneficial to our shipping. Our shipping was then very much depressed. This depression had steadily increased from 1822 until it was in a deplorable condition in 1829; and then the Congress of that time voted to repeal this tonnage tax in order to lighten the burdens on shipping. The result was a steady growth up to 1861.

Now, sir, I propose in supporting this amendment that we remit this revenue for one or two or three years; that we do away with this taxation for two or three years; that we repeal it for two or three or four years in order to set these nations an example of liberality. It is a burden of $200,000 or $300,000 a year upon the American merchant marine. What are we trying to do? We are trying to lighten the burdens on the American merchant marine. I have already alluded to the vast discrimination which this tax makes as against the American merchant marine. It weighs it down, it burdens it, and should be removed.

I feel strongly upon this subject. I feel there is no subject so important as this to the prosperity, the glory, and power of this nation. I feel that the freer you make your shipping, the less you tax your shipping, the more you extend your commercial power, the more you extend your marine power, the more swiftly will grow the greatness and glory of the country. And it is an effort in that direction to get rid of the tax that does us no good whatever. It is an endeavor simply to remit a tax of $1,000,000 on foreign vessels in order to get rid of two or three hundred thousand dollars on American vessels; and I trust the House will adopt it.

Our example in years gone by has been followed by other nations. We repealed the light-tax in 1830, and in 1849, I believe, England, the last of the nations to do so, followed our example and repealed the light-duties in regard to American vessels. It is for the purpose of setting them this example and to relieve American shipping of this burden that I shall earnestly advocate the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]. It was a war tax imposed in 1861, in war times, and for war purposes, and had it not been for the war it would not have been upon the statute-book to-day.

Mr. DUNHAM. I desire to say that I have myself been engaged in business where this tonnage tax has caused expense not only to myself, but I can plainly see that the tax really comes out of the farmer, especially in the Western States.

Every year I have been in the habit of shipping large quantities of grain to Canadian ports. It has been invariably the case that when I applied to a vessel agent in Chicago for a vessel to go to a Canadian port with a load of corn or wheat the answer at once was, "I have not paid my tonnage dues, and I shall want a half a cent or a cent per bushel extra to pay me for going to a Canadian port." That has been the answer, even though the Canadian port was very near to an American port. Only last fall I was compelled at times to pay the same rate of freight to Sarnia, near Port Huron in Michigan, that the rate to Buffalo was on the same day and at the same minute. Why? Because of this tonnage tax.

I am sorry to say that the vessel-owners at times, as it is natural that they should do, take advantage of this tonnage tax in order to get an increased rate of freight. For instance, they would charter a vessel in August to one party and say that they must have a half a cent or a cent a bushel extra freight on account of this tonnage tax; and they would say that all through the season to others to whom they chartered vessels. They would thus practically get this half a cent or a cent per bushel extra every time they chartered a vessel, and the money comes out of the farmer while the vessel-owner does not suffer.

It is for that reason that I am in favor of no tonnage tax whatever, in order that the farmer or American producer may save this money rather than have it go into the pockets of the American vessel-owner.

Mr. ELLIS. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. EATON. I move to strike out the last word. I am not quite satisfied with the amendment of my friend from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN]. I am not second to any member on this floor in my desire to place the shipping interest of this country upon a proper basis. In the other branch of the National Legislature I had the honor years ago to endeavor—unsuccessfully, I admit—to place the shipping interest of this country upon a proper and legitimate basis.

I am in favor of free ships, free iron, free anything that will give to the American merchant marine its former position on the ocean. But I do not quite see how this amendment of my friend from Arkansas will tend to that end, nor do I quite see the force of the argument of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS].

"It won't do," to use the expression of a distinguished Senator from Ohio in years gone by, "it won't do" to say that we do not need the revenue. That is a poor argument, permit me to say, for any government to use that owes from fifteen hundred to two thousand millions of dollars. We need all the legitimate revenue which we can obtain; and permit me to say to my friend from New York [Mr. COX] I desire no other, because I desire none but a constitutional revenue. But we need it all, let it come from whatever source it may.

The argument of my friend from Louisiana [Mr. ELLIS], ingenious as it was, does not satisfy my mind. Perhaps it is my fault, not his. I would rather do this: increase the tonnage tax upon the vessels of every foreign country on earth, and discriminate in favor of American bottoms; I would rather do that.

Mr. ELLIS. And have yourself discriminated out of foreign ports by foreign nations.

Mr. EATON. Not yet; not until we have something to be discriminated in.

Mr. ELLIS. That would result in the absolute destruction of whatever glimmer of hope remains for the revival of American commerce.

Mr. EATON. I do not so see it. Such is not my reading of the history of a thousand years; I do not so understand it myself. The mere assertion by my friend from Louisiana, however much I may regard his judgment, does not convince me. I would discriminate in favor of American bottoms and against foreign bottoms. They must come here to get our cotton, our wheat, and everything that is shipped to foreign ports.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman allow me to inform him——

Mr. EATON. Yes, for I have no doubt I need the information.

Mr. DUNN. The present law discriminates in favor of American bottoms. The tonnage tax on American-built ships is only half what it is on foreign-built ships.

Mr. EATON. I am glad of that.

Mr. DUNN. And our commerce has perished under the influence of that law.

Mr. EATON. My friend has not informed me of anything; I knew that before. [Laughter.] I would take it all off; I would not have any tonnage tax on American ships, and I would have a tonnage tax on foreign ships. We are paying annually $115,000,000 in gold and silver to foreign ship-owners in our freights and in our passage-money, and now you propose to take off the tonnage tax from foreign-built ships.

I do not see that it is in the line of my duty, favoring as I do everything that looks to the advantage of the merchant marine of the United States, to take off this tonnage duty from foreign ships.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. It occurs to me that the argument of the gentleman from Maine is delusive when he says that $1,000,000 of this tax comes from foreign vessels and only $300,000 from ours. The reason of the difference is that we have not so many vessels. The burden on each American ship is as great as the burden on each foreign ship. In my judgment, the tonnage laws as they now exist are really a discrimination against American vessels; and this discrimination the amendment proposed by the committee will increase. If you have an entry tax of 3 cents a ton, it will be upon an American steamer making twelve voyages a year 36 cents per ton in each year, instead of 30 cents as required by existing law.

Mr. DIBBLE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I would prefer that the gentleman should answer one, as I do not profess to be familiar with this question.

Mr. DIBBLE. This bill limits the tax in any one year to 15 cents a ton.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. That is on short voyages. I am talking about long voyages. I am speaking of those American steamships that we are anxious to build up which shall cross the Atlantic not merely to England, but to France, Germany, and Spain.

Mr. DINGLEY. The gentleman will allow me to say that an amendment which will be offered in due time provides that the amount of this tax shall not exceed 30 cents per ton in any one year.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the committee amendment to which he refers will not increase, but will rather reduce the present burden? Will it increase or diminish the burden now resting on American and foreign ships alike for voyages between this country and Europe?

Mr. DINGLEY. It will decrease the burden as to the great majority of vessels—as to nearly every American vessel; for most of the American vessels in the foreign trade are sailing vessels.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I refer to steamers.

Mr. DINGLEY. Where foreign and American steamers make the same number of trips the charges will be alike; we propose to make no discrimination. And let me say to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] that he was mistaken when he said, in answer to the gentleman from Connecticut, that we put a less charge upon American vessels than on foreign vessels. Under our reciprocal treaties with other nations, the charges must be uniform.

Mr. DUNN. Since I made the remark my attention has been called to such a provision in the treaty of Washington; but when I made my statement I was guided by the reading of the statutes which were in existence prior to that treaty.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. We want to encourage our iron and steel steamships which shall ply between American and foreign ports. If we reduce the tax on American and foreign vessels alike we discriminate in favor of American ships. The rate of interest on capital invested being less in England than the rates which capital can command in this country, the more we diminish the tax the more we diminish the advantage which English ships have from the lower rate of interest upon capital. Therefore I am in favor of a reduction of these taxes, and I believe I will vote with the gentleman from Arkansas for their entire repeal.

Mr. EATON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move the previous question on the pending section and amendment.

Mr. ELLIS. I hope the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. SLOCUM (to Mr. ELLIS). If you want to kill the bill go on and talk.

Mr. ELLIS. I do not want to kill the bill, but to make it really what it purports to be. I ask the gentleman to allow five minutes' further discussion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SLOCUM. I insist on my motion.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If the previous question is going to cut off the opportunity to offer further amendments I hope it will be voted down. I have a very material amendment to offer to the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Indeed, I think that if the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DUNN] knew the amendment I desire to offer he would withdraw his and allow mine to come in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the pending section and amendment.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. State it.

Mr. PARKER. Will the adoption of this motion cut off the right to make further amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will to this section only.

Mr. PARKER. If the gentleman will permit me I will say I trust it will be voted down. This is an important section, and I think we have a right as legislators on this floor to submit amendments and to explain them.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. If the previous question is ordered it will cut off amendments to this section?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. That is not what the gentleman from New York wants nor what I want.

Mr. SLOCUM. I will give the gentleman an opportunity to offer his amendment, and will modify my demand for the previous question, confining it to the pending amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. DUNN'S substitute.

Mr. SLOCUM demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 78.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I move to insert in line 11, after the words "6 cents per ton," the words "not to exceed in the aggregate 30 cents per ton in any one year." I would go a long way to have the entire tonnage tax repealed. I am not ready at this time to vote for that repeal, because other nations discriminate against us. I do not think the substitute of the gentleman from Arkansas was explicit enough on that point. My amendment leaves the law as it is to-day. The committee reported 6 cents a ton, which is double what the law is.

Mr. DINGLEY. Thirty per annum.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Which is about 3 cents per ton as voyages are now made. My amendment is to let the law remain as it is, at 30 cents per ton in the aggregate for any one year, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SLOCUM. I do not object to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I offer an amendment which will abolish the tax as to vessels engaged in trade from Canada, and for this reason: The committee, when we reported this, were uncertain whether Canada had abolished her tax on American vessels or not.

A MEMBER. They have.

Mr. DINGLEY. We have since learned they have, and that carries out the principle adopted by the committee. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "or from any port or place in the Dominion of Canada or Newfoundland," and strike out all after "port," in the thirteenth line, to and including "Revised Statutes," in the sixteenth line, and insert, "provided, that vessels engaged in trade between the United States and the Dominion of Canada shall be exempt from the payment of the tax herein authorized."

Mr. SLOCUM. I offer the following as a substitute for the section and pending amendment, and on that I demand the previous question.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That in lieu of the tax on tonnage of 30 cents per ton per annum heretofore imposed by law, a duty of 3 cents per ton, not to exceed in the aggregate 15 cents per ton in any one year, is hereby imposed at each entry on all vessels which shall be entered in any port of the United States from any foreign port or place in North America, Central America, the West India Islands, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, or the Sandwich Islands, or Newfoundland; and a duty of 6 cents per ton, not to exceed 30 cents per ton per annum, is hereby imposed at each entry upon all vessels which shall be entered in the United States from any other foreign ports: Provided, That the President of the United States shall suspend the collection of so much of the duty herein imposed on vessels entered from any port in the Dominion of Canada, Newfoundland, the Bahama Islands, the Bermuda Islands, the West India Islands, Mexico, and Central America, down to and including Aspinwall and Panama, as may be in excess of the tonnage and light-house dues, or other equivalent tax or taxes, imposed on American vessels by the government of the foreign country in which such port is situated, and shall upon the passage of this act, and from time to time thereafter as often as it may become necessary by reason of change in the laws of the foreign countries above mentioned, indicate by proclamation the ports to which such suspension shall apply, and the rate or rates of tonnage duty, if any, to be collected under such suspension: And provided further, That all vessels which have paid the tonnage tax imposed by section 4219 of the Revised Statutes fro the current year shall not be liable to the tax herein levied until the expiration of the certificate of last payment of the said tax. And sections 4223 and 4224, and so much of section 4219 of the Revised Statutes as conflicts with this section, are hereby repealed.

Mr. SLOCUM. I move the previous question upon that section and the pending amendment.

Mr. PARKER. I wish to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM].

The substitute was agreed to.

The section as amended was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That the tax of 40 cents per month authorized to be assessed and collected from the master or owner of every vessel of the United States engaged in the foreign trade, for every seaman employed on such vessel, is hereby abolished on and after July 1, 1884; and so much of the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service as shall arise from the relief of such seamen as are employed on vessels engaged in the foreign trade shall on and after such date be borne by the United States. And so much of sections 4585 and 4587 of the Revised Statutes as authorizes the assessment and collection of such hospital tax for seamen employed on vessels of the United States engaged in the foreign trade, or requires the masters of such vessels to render an account of the number of seamen on said vessels for the purpose of assessing such tax, is hereby repealed.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I have an amendment to offer to this section 15, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 of section 15, after the words "United States," strike out the words "engaged in the foreign trade." In line 6 strike out the words "so much of." In lines 7 and 8 strike out the words "as shall arise from the relief of such seamen as are employed on vessels engaged in the foreign trade;" and in lines 13 and 14 strike out the words "engaged in the foreign trade;" so that as amended it will read:

"SEC. 15. That the tax of 40 cents per month authorized to be assessed and collected from the master or owner of every vessel of the United States, for every seaman employed on such vessel, is hereby abolished on and after July 1, 1884; and the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service shall on and after such date be borne by the United States. And so much of sections 4585 and 4587 of the Revised Statutes as authorizes the assessment and collection of such hospital tax for seamen employed on vessels of the United States, or requires the masters of such vessels," &c.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. My purpose in moving the amendment to the pending section is to make this bill conform, if I can, to a similar bill now pending in the Senate, and I will read the fifteenth section of that bill:

SEC. 15. Sections 4585, 4586, and 4587 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the assessment and collection of a hospital tax for seamen, are hereby repealed, and the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service shall hereafter be borne by the United States.

By striking out the words I have indicated it will be seen that it will make the House bill conform in all respects to the bill of the Senate, the corresponding sections of which I have just read. I did intend to move the exact language of the Senate bill for this section as a substitute. But the act of March 3, 1875, is not incorporated into the Revised Statutes of the United States. Now, I can not see why it is that the bill reported to this House did not repeal in toto all the tax. Why repeal the tax as to vessels engaged in the foreign trade and not to those engaged in the coastwise trade?

It seems by the act of 1875 there was some doubt in the mind of the courts and the parties called upon to construe the act as to the meaning of the word "seaman" where it is used in the statutes referred to in the Senate bill; and in chapter 156 of the act of 1875, section 3, it is provided as follows:

SEC. 3. That the term "seaman" wherever employed in legislation relating to the Marine-Hospital Service shall be held to include any person employed on board in the care, preservation, or navigation of any vessel, or in the service, on board, of those engaged in such care, preservation, or navigation.

It will be seen that the word "seaman" applies to all who may be employed on board the vessel, and the inequality of the act may thus be seen at a glance. The seamen themselves have petitioned Congress to repeal this tax.

Now, I presented to the House, and I also hold in my hand here, a petition of the sailors and seamen and other employés on board of these coastwise vessels extending from Philadelphia to Hartford, asking a total repeal of this law. As an act of justice to them I think they are entitled to the relief prayed for. It is a tax imposed by no other government upon its seamen, and I submit to the committee that it should be forthwith repealed.

The wages paid to seamen upon our coastwise vessels are not, as I am informed, in excess of $16 a month; and they are the only class of citizens in our country who are directly taxed for the support of any hospital in the country. I know well enough that if a bill were introduced here to tax all of the railroad employés, all of the car conductors, or any other employés engaged in any other branch of industry that you might name 40 cents each as a direct tax for the purpose of supporting an asylum or hospital of any kind, it would not receive one vote in this House from any member present on the floor. And in view of the fact that this causes considerable irritation and annoyance between the owners of vessels and these seamen, I ask that the amendment I have offered be incorporated into this bill. I now ask the Clerk to read a paragraph from a New Orleans paper upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE MARINE-HOSPITAL TAX.

The assessment of 40 cents per month upon seamen, steamboat deck-hands, roustabouts, and others, without regard to the compensation paid them, has for a long time been the subject of discussion by the friends of the class affected by the exaction. Steps have recently been taken to lay this matter before Congress in the form of a petition to abolish the tax on the laboring men, nearly all of whom are poor, and defray the expenses of the Marine-Hospital Service out of the United States Treasury as other public institutions are maintained.

One is surprised to see such an equitable proposition antagonized by those who profess to be the friends of all who earn their living by the work of their hands and personal services. Yet a good deal of opposition has been engendered by, as near as we can learn, a few persons, whose reasons therefor are not very clear, operating upon the minds of others whom they habitually and adroitly deceive as to the facts and figures of the present system and the merits of the controversy. It is, in our judgment, unjust to tax workingmen pure and simple at all for any purpose whatever.

Their services are absolutely necessary to maintain the commerce of the country, both outward and inward. From this commerce the Government derives its chief revenue and capital satisfactory profits. The one is already sufficiently taxed in the tariff bill to exempt it from further burdens, while in our judgment the other, the Government, can well afford to provide for the sick and disabled of those to whose manual efforts the commerce and the resulting revenue are so largely indebted. The cause seems to us akin to that other which was espoused by The Item about a year or two ago and so forcibly presented to Congress by its friends that it was finally won. We refer to the reduction of fees for licenses granted to officers and skilled employés of steamboats. These fees, which were excessively severe, have been reduced to a mere nominal tax, which, as we learn, is now cheerfully paid. But poor Jack and the common steamboat hands are yet subject to an exaction of 40 cents a month—$4.80 per annum, which is retained by the vessel out of their pay monthly, and turned over to the marine-hospital fund—sometimes.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I ask the privilege of incorporating with my remarks the following schedule of taxes collected for the support of the hospitals:

Comparative statement of the marine-hospital tax collected and expenses, by districts, for 1883.

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe I had the honor of presenting a petition signed by a good many people in favor of the retention of this tax to support these hospitals. Evidence has been brought to me that that petition was signed by men who do not understand its full import. I desire to make that statement. My opinion is it would be wise for us now to remove the burden from this class of people. I do not see, as my colleague has said, why we should exempt people employed on railroads from a tax to support them when sick, or to care for them in hospital, and leave this tax remaining on sailors.

I do not propose to make a long argument; but I wish to say I have a letter here from Dr. Hamilton, of the United States Marine-Hospital Service, which I ask to have read, and which will confirm my vote in favor of the proposition of my colleague.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. You say you see no reason why the Government should impose a tax in support of a marine hospital and not have a tax for the support of sick railroad-men and men in other employments. Then I ask you why the Government should keep up a hospital for the employés of the marine service when it does not for railroad employés? That is what the amendment will do.

Mr. COX, of New York. The fact remains that ever since our Government has been established there has been provision made by hospitals for this improvident class of men called sailors. They are subject to all sorts of inclemencies; and I think this is no more than just on behalf of these men who go round and about the earth and who have not the domesticities which Congressmen always enjoy. I call for the reading of Dr. Hamilton's letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES MARINE-HOSPITAL SERVICE,
OFFICE OF THE SURGEON-GENERAL,
April 25, 1884.

MY DEAR SIR: I have been asked to give you my opinion on the matter of the position of the service in relation to the reduction of the marine-hospital tax, and possibly its abolition in case Congress chooses to maintain the service without taxation, and in regard to that can only say that this whole question is viewed as beyond the province of this office, and it does not seem that it could in any way be injured by Congress assuming its support, as it now does that of the other humanitarian services.

The beneficiaries of the service are in large part homeless waifs who are not subject to the operations of the local poor laws, and consequently it would appear to be a humanitarian act for the United States to take care of them when sick or disabled, and one almost necessary for the honor of the country, if it is deemed best to change the present method. Concerning the wisdom of that change it seems to resolve itself into a financial question only, about which I do not think the opinion of this office is entitled to any special weight.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN B. HAMILTON.

Hon. S. S. COX, M. C.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to strike out the last word.

This is a question, Mr. Speaker, upon which I can speak for a moment without playing the demagogue to any extent. There are no seamen in my district. We have no waters in Iowa that float anything. It seems to me, in view of the fact that those men do not get more than half the wages we pay to Iowa farm hands, and in view of the fact that no other workmen of any kind have taxes levied upon their wages for the purpose of supporting the hospitals, that there is a distinction here which I should like to see wiped out, and wiped out now. It is entirely opposed to the whole spirit of our institutions. The rule of taxation is to levy taxes upon men who are able to pay taxes.

The American merchant marine must be built up some day. And to you gentlemen who wonder whether any amendments to our laws now would help to build up American shipping I would like to take this occasion to say that just as soon as capital gets through building railroads it will build you all the ships you want. We people in the interior are making the money to build both the railways and the merchant marine eventually. No country can have a merchant marine without sailors. No country can have a navy without sailors. It is coming to the time when we shall have a merchant marine and a navy both, and looking to that time every discrimination against that class of men should be removed, and should be removed now.

Mr. SLOCUM. I ask unanimous consent of the House to vacate the order for an evening session for debate for this evening only, in order that the House may continue the consideration of the pending bill this evening.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. You would not get a quorum at an evening session.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let the gentleman from New York ask that the session may be extended beyond 5 o'clock.

Mr. SLOCUM. I make that request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] asks unanimous consent that the order of the House requiring that a recess be taken from 5 until 8 o'clock this evening be vacated.

Mr. RANDALL. Does the Committee on Ways and Means consent to that?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, does the House consent to it? Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. I object until I know that the Committee on Ways and Means consent.

Mr. MORRISON. For my part I am willing to give my consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the order for a recess be abrogated for this evening, in order that the session may be continued——

Mr. BLOUNT. Beyond 5 o'clock?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Until the House adjourns. Is there objection?

Mr. DUNHAM. I ask the gentleman from New York if he can not go on and finish the bill now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the object which the gentleman from New York desires to accomplish.

Mr. DUNHAM. Then I do not object.

There being no objection, the order for a recess was vacated for this evening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment submitted by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Is debate exhausted on the pending amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Then I move to strike out the last word, in order to call attention to one feature of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS], which I think ought to receive deliberate consideration before it is adopted by this House. I have no objection to repealing the law imposing the tax which he has mentioned, if experience has proven that it is not right.

But I do not think the House ought to adopt the second provision of his amendment. In commenting upon it the gentleman from New York offering the amendment [Mr. ADAMS] and his colleague [Mr. COX] both laid stress upon the fact that there ought not to be a tax of this kind imposed upon seamen any more than there should be a tax imposed upon the employés of railroad and other transportation lines and of interior steamboat lines for the purpose of taking care of their sick and disabled. Thus far their argument is good. But what further does the amendment propose? It proposes that the Government of the United States shall assume charge of this marine hospital and pay for its maintenance.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. As the Government assumes control of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. MCMIILLIN. In other words, it proposes that a hospital for the benefit of this class of persons shall be supported out of the public Treasury, shall be provided for out of the revenues derived from the masses of the people. To that feature of the amendment I object. I do not see any reason for it. For years we have got along without it.

What excuse can any Representative living in the interior give to his constituents for providing means to support a hospital for these men; for providing that another class of employés not in the Government service shall be taken care of by the Government, whereas when any of his own constituents become afflicted they must take care of themselves. There is no sufficient reason for such action on our part. While I am entirely willing to repeal the tax upon the sailor and place it in another shape upon the ships, if experience has proven that to be the best, I do not think that, without any tax either upon the shipping or upon those to be benefited by the maintenance of this hospital, the people at large should bear the expense of maintaining it.

Mr. MCADOO. It seems to me that the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is entirely fallacious. In the first place, the brakeman on a railroad is a citizen of some State, county, or city which can take care of him in such institution as they may tax their citizens to support. But the sailor is peculiarly a representative of the Federal power.

Mr. MCMILLIN. But a citizen of some State.

Mr. MCADOO. He is peculiarly the representative of the United States upon the high seas and upon the waters of the United States. There is another consideration: the Government now supports this hospital in part. So far as the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] goes, I will say that the Government is now obliged to pay out more money for this purpose than it has received from this tax.

I think the whole tax should be abolished, that we should lighten to that extent the burdens which are now bearing down American shipping. I do not see any reason for this discrimination against the American seamen and in favor of foreign seamen. The amount collected from seamen engaged in our foreign trade last year was $81,507.49, while the amount collected from those engaged in our domestic trade was $329,589.21.

In other words, it is the domestic sailor who is paying the most of this tax by our law, and it is the domestic sailor which the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS] is seeking to free from this thralldom. I think this great and rich Government should be able to support this institution. The tonnage tax which this House to-day has refused to abolish will furnish more than will be necessary to support an institution of this kind.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. Three times over.

Mr. MCADOO. I believe if members of the Congress of the United States could stand of a fine summer's day at the Narrows of New York and see the foreign flags which are floating in the air from the mast-heads of foreign vessels in those waters they would be willing to do something which would tend to some extent to revive American shipping. We want this burden stricken from our shipping. We want the white stars of democratic freedom to replace in American and all other waters the red, angry cross of Saint George.

I do not want to indulge in any debate on this question more than is necessary, because I hope this bill will pass. It may be only a modicum of what is needed, but we should pass this bill and then hereafter do what further is needed.

Mr. SLOCUM. I do not desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS]. I simply want the House to understand exactly what it means. We paid for the support of this marine hospital last year $450,000, and we collected by means of this tax $400,000. The General Government, therefore, contributed to the support of these marine hospitals the sum of $50,000.

These institutions are supported just precisely as the Soldiers' Home up here is supported. Every month when pay-day comes around the paymaster deducts a quarter of a dollar from each soldier's pay and it goes to the support of this home up here, so that when a soldier is discharged he can go there and find a resting place. This tax is on the same principle. We take out of the sailor's wages 40 cents every month, and when he gets sick he is furnished with a home.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. You do not mean to say that where a soldier is kept for the remainder of his life on the tax of 25 cents a month it is the same as supplying hospital accommodations to a sailor who contributes 40 cents a month?

Mr. SLOCUM. It is precisely the same in principle. If the House of Representatives think it proper to take the burden of this tax on the Government, I have no objection to it But I want the House to understand exactly what it is doing. The proposition is simply to support this special class of the community at the expense of other classes. I now move the previous question upon the pending section and amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I do not think the House understands the amendment we are to vote upon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, strike out the words "engaged in the foreign trade."
In line 6, strike out the words "so much of."
In lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "as shall arise from the relief of such seaman as are employed on vessels engaged in the foreign trade."
In lines 13 and 14, strike out the words "engaged in the foreign trade."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the section as it will read if the amendment be adopted.

The Clerk read as fo ows:

SEC. 15. That the tax of 40 cents per month authorized to be assessed and collected from the master or owner of every vessel of the United States, for every seaman employed on such vessel, is hereby abolished on and after July 1, 1884; and the expense of maintaining the Marine Hospital Service shall on and after such date be borne by the United States. And so much of sections 4585 and 4587 of the Revised Statutes as authorizes the assessment and collection of such hospital tax for seamen employed on vessels of the United States, or requires the masters of such vessels to render an account of the number of seamen on said vessels for the purpose of assessing such tax, is hereby repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What particular amendment is it that has the effect to throw upon the United States the support of the marine hospital?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is only one amendment pending, that offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADAMS].

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 74, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that no quorum has voted. This is a very important amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ADAMS, of New York, and Mr. HOLMAN were appointed.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the count by tellers can be suspended for a moment I wish to state that if this amendment be adopted I propose to move to insert, after the words "United States," in line 9, the words "and defrayed out of the receipts from the tonnage tax." This practically puts the burden on the vessel, and should, it seems to me, remove all difficulty.

Mr. HAMMOND. It comes out of the Treasury all the same.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I call for the regular order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 97, noes 69.

So the amendment of Mr. ADAMS, of New York, was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move to amend the section by in-serting after the words "United States," in line 9, the words "and defrayed out of the receipts from the tonnage tax."

Mr. HAMMOND. I rise to a point of order, and submit that as the previous question has been ordered upon this section no further amendment to it is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw that point.

Mr. EATON. I hope not. Let this money come out of the Treasury. The tonnage tax goes into the Treasury.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question having been ordered on the section, it is not subject to further amendment.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would it be in order now to move to strike out the fifteenth section entirely? If so, I make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that a motion to strike out the section is in the nature of an amendment to the section, and is not in order now, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the previous question was ordered only on the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the section and the pending amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the motion was for the previous question on the pending amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Clerk informs the Chair, the motion was that the previous question be ordered upon the section and pending amendment. The previous question having been ordered in that form, this section is not subject to further amendment.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Was the section as amended adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not necessary. It is not the custom to take a vote on each section as we pass it.

Mr. HOLMAN. That makes it more extraordinary. The previous question should be called on the pending section as well as the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That section 2966 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the words "propelled in whole or in part by steam;" so that said section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2966. When merchandise shall be imported into any port of the United States from any foreign country in vessels, and it shall appear by the bills of lading that the merchandise so imported is to be delivered immediately after the entry of the vessel, the collector of such port may take possession of such merchandise and deposit the same in bonded warehouse; and when it does not appear by the bills of lading that the merchandise so imported is to be immediately delivered, the collector of the customs may take possession of the same and deposit it in bonded warehouse, at the request of the owner, master, or consignee of the vessel, on three days' notice to such collector after the entry of the vessel."

No amendment was offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That section 2872 of the Revised Statutes be amended by adding thereto the following:

"When the license to unload between the setting and rising of the sun is granted to a sailing vessel under this section, a fixed, uniform, and reasonable compensation may be allowed to the inspector or inspectors for service between the setting and rising of the sun, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, to be received by the collector from the master, owner, or consignee of the vessel, and to be paid by him to the inspector or inspectors."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I move to amend by adding the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

And on all such merchandise imported in vessels of the United States the owners of such vessels citizens of the United States shall be entitled to receive 5 per cent. of the duties collected by the Government.

Mr. DINGLEY. I make the point of order that amendment is not germane.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules the amendment out.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That whenever any fine, penalty, forfeiture, exaction, or charge arising under the laws relating to vessels or seamen has been paid to any collector of customs or consular officer, and application has been made within one year from such payment for the refunding or remission of the same, the Secretary of the Treasury, if on investigation he finds that such fine, penalty, forfeiture, exaction, or charge was illegally, improperly, or excessively imposed, shall have the power, either before or after the same has been covered into the Treasury, to refund so much of such fine, penalty, forfeiture, exaction, or charge as he may think proper, from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GEORGE. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That section 2776 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"Provided, That vessels arriving at a port of entry in the United States laden with coal, salt, railroad-iron, and other like articles in bulk, may proceed to places within that collection district to be specially designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, by general regulations or otherwise, under the superintendence of customs officers, at the expense of the parties interested, for the purpose of unlading cargoes of the character before mentioned."

Mr. GEORGE. That is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX, of New York. I propose an amendment, to come in after the section just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 20. That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any citizen or citizens of the United States to import iron and steel built steamships of not less than 3,000 tons measurement free of duty; and such ships shall be admitted to American register: Provided, That said ships shall be the exclusive property of a citizen or citizens of the United States: And provided further, That such ships shall be excluded from the coastwise trade.

Mr. COX, of New York. I do not propose to debate this.

Mr. DINGLEY. I was going to make a point of order on it, but I will not do so. But as I understand the amendment will be ruled in order, I will not take up the time.

Mr. COX, of New York. I am much obliged to the gentleman. I do not propose to debate it except to say I copied it from a bill which passed Congress in 1870, under the recommendation of General Grant. At the time of the German and French war a great many German vessels were lying at Hoboken, and General Grant recommended they should be taken under the American flag. He recommended they should be free at 1,000 tons; but I propose 3,000, and except the coastwise trade. I do not wish to interefere with such an industry, and although this is not my ideal or what I want, yet I think it is fair and just.

Mr. KASSON. Insert the words "and internal."

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to oppose the amendment. In the first place, even if it should be adopted its effect can hardly be otherwise than to defeat the whole bill. Therefore I think so long as it is a proposition which has been reported to the House in substance at least, if not exactly the same, and which is now upon the Calendar, the gentleman from New York should allow it to remain until it is reached in a legitimate way.

Mr. COX, of New York. Was it not an adverse report?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes; but there is a minority report for free ships.

Mr. COX, of New York. I only want a vote taken now. I think if it goes to the Senate the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am unwilling to detain the House, but this is a matter of so much importance that I feel called upon to state my objections to it somewhat in detail.

It proposes to overthrow the policy adopted by the First Congress under the Constitution, and approved by Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and Madison. I object to the proposition for these, among other reasons:

1. The admission of foreign-built ships to an American register free of duty, as proposed by the amendment, would obviously be a serious injustice to our ship-builders, in view of the fact that neither the existing tariff nor any proposed tariff legislation admits any other completed manufacture, involving so much skilled labor as does a vessel, without the payment of at least 30 per cent. duty.

2. The free-ship policy looks to the purchase abroad of whatever vessels we may want for the foreign trade, and would inevitably result in the destruction of the ship-building industry in this country. The average wages paid in an American ship-yard are at least 50 per cent. higher than in the English ship-yards. With this disadvantage no capitalists would invest the money required to establish extensive iron-ship yards in this country (for as yet iron-ship building is in its infancy here) with the knowledge that they must compete with English builders in a common market. No industry producing manufactured goods could have ever been established in this country if similar imported products of foreign manufacturers had been admitted free of duty. Whatever we might be able to do after the lapse of a sufficient time to secure the needed plant and obtain the requisite experience, the admission now of foreign-built ships free of duty to American registry would effectually prevent the development of iron-ship building in this country.

The example of Germany is frequently cited as proof that free ships in the United States would lead to the establishment of iron-ship yards here, as it is claimed to have done in that country. But it should be borne in mind that Germany had, and still has, as cheap labor as England, and therefore was not placed at any disadvantage in competition with the latter, except in the single direction of want of experience in the business; and this is soon overcome where other conditions are equal. But the United States, on the other hand, has not only the same temporary disadvantage of lack of experience in iron-ship building, but also the constant disadvantage of higher wages for labor.

It is said that the free-ship policy, as formulated in the pending amendment, leaves the construction of vessels for the coastwise trade to American ship-builders, and that the demand for such vessels will build up iron-ship building.

Unquestionably if the free-ship policy should obtain a footing under the limited plan proposed by the pending bill it would be but a short time before it would be amended so as to include the coasting trade.

Even if this were not probable, it should be borne in mind that iron-ship building can never be greatly extended, and iron-ship yards, capable of building the class of iron steamships requisite for transatlantic and transpacific service and war purposes, established to any considerable extent, unless we build vessels for the trade requiring vessels of such tonnage. This reason alone makes it even more necessary to guard against the free admission of large vessels than of small.

If it is expected to induce business men to invest the requisite capital to successfully establish and maintain iron-ship yards in this country to an extent sufficient to meet our requirements for vessels of the best type in peace and war it is necessary to give them to understand that they are not to be met at the beginning of their enterprises with the free, open competition of the well-established ship-yards on the Clyde, whose owners will be sure to put forth special efforts to break down in its infancy an industry in this country which might prove in five or ten years a troublesome competitor.

3. If we should adopt the policy of admitting foreign-built ships free of duty to American register, and thus open to any one the privilege of buying vessels on the Clyde for the foreign trade, it would not materially increase the tonnage of the American merchant marine, for two reasons: first, because ship-building and ship-owning are so linked together that the one interest rises and falls with the other; and, second, because the chief obstacle to a revival of our foreign carrying trade is not the first cost of an American vessel, but the difficulty of profitably sailing it after it is built.

No instance can be found in history where a nation has obtained and maintained a strong position on the ocean so long as it has relied on other nations to build its vessels. The ship-using nations have always been the ship-building nations, and vice versa. If we can not devise a policy to enable us to build our own vessels, we may rest assured that it will be utterly useless to think of permanently reviving our foreign carrying trade by adopting the policy of buying our ships of English builders. It is the ship-builders who are the largest ship-owners. It is the ship-builder who in nine cases out of ten is the prime mover in putting vessels into the carrying trades. It is the ship-builders who are to-day mainly instrumental in keeping afloat the remnant of the American merchant marine in the foreign trade. Adopt the free-ship policy, and instead of building up our merchant marine, it will tend to drive out of the business the men who are to-day making so gallant a fight for American ships.

It is suggested that most of the practical ship-owners oppose the free-ship policy as an injury rather than an aid to the revival of our foreign carrying trade. A prominent ship-owner of New York, in response to an inquiry, recently stated that if the free-ship policy should be adopted he would prefer to retire from the business rather than to go to England to buy his vessels; and that even if he should overcome his patriotic instincts so far as to buy a British-built vessel to save a small amount in the first cost, he should not think of sailing it under the American flag, because he could sail it more profitably under the British flag, and save more money in this way than by the original purchase.

The fact that a vessel can be sailed more profitably under the British flag than under ours presents the real difficulty in the way of a revival of our foreign carrying trade, a difficulty which free ships would not overcome. The insufficiency of the free-ship remedy was admitted by the most intelligent and prominent promoter of this policy when he said to the joint select committee of the Forty-seventh Congress that—

> If Americans could not use foreign-built ships when they desired to do so in the coasting trade, they would prefer to own them, as they own them now, under the British flag, because it is more economical.

In other words, few Americans would care to buy British vessels and sail them under an American register, with existing conditions, unless they could put their vessels into the coasting trade.

One of the officers of the only American transatlantic steamship company, which has four American and four chartered British vessels, recently stated that his company is thinking of selling their American vessels to British owners, and then chartering them to run under English laws, because they can be sailed more profitably under the British flag than under ours. When American ship-owners are ready to sell their vessels for this reason, it is idle to talk about free ships being a remedy for the decline of the American merchant marine in the foreign trade.

If the revolution in marine architecture from wood to iron and sails to steam had not come to England's aid, her adoption of the free-ship policy in 1849 would have utterly failed to aid her shipping. Between 1849 and 1855 the merchant marine of the United States increased 1,877,985 tons, while that of the United Kingdom increased only 894,828 tons; and this advantage on the part of the merchant marine of the United States would have continued under England's free-ship policy had not a new factor come in. This is conceded by Mr. W. S. Lindsey, the most prominent promoter of the British legislation of 1849, who, speaking in his History of Merchant Shipping of the first year's results of that policy, says:

> Our [the British] ship-owners naturally viewed with great alarm the rapid strides made by American shipping. Nor were their fears allayed by a reference to the board of trade returns, wherein it appeared that while the increase of British shipping had in the year previous to repeal been 393,955 tons, there had been a decrease in the year after repeal of 180,576 tons. Our position appeared, therefore, critical; and had it not been for the resources we held within ourselves [referring to iron, coal, and cheap labor] and the indomitable energy of our people, foreign shipping might then and there have gained an ascendency which might not afterward have been easily overcome. * * * We had one advantage which our great American competitor did not possess. We had iron in abundance, and about this period we were specially directing our attention to the construction of iron ships to be propelled by the screw.

Speaking subsequently of the contest for supremacy of the seas between 1853 and 1854, the same distinguished English ship-builder says:

> A very large amount of capital had been invested by Americans in the famous ships employed in the California trade; but even these before the close of 1854 were becoming unremunerative, owing to the competition of British iron and screw steamers, which were the main weapon whereby we bade defiance to the competition of all other nations in the general ocean race then just commenced.—Lindsey's Merchant Shipping, page 358.

The whole subject has recently been carefully investigated by the Italian Government, which, notwithstanding Italy has had all the alleged benefits of a free-ship policy for twenty years, finds that of 2,904,969 tons of merchandise landed at or shipped from Italian ports in the year 1882, only 293,883 tons were carried in Italian steamers, while 2,133,133 tons were carried in English steamers. Referring to the views of Italian statesmen on the efficacy of the free-ship policy, United States Consul Crain, at Milan, in a report to the State Department under date of November 5, 1883, says:

> Italians have been at liberty for more than twenty years to buy steamships on the Clyde or elsewhere, but this privilege has done nothing for the expansion of the steam marine. The policy of free ships has had a long trial in France, Germany, Austria, and other countries with no better result. History affords no example of a sea-going people who were not also a ship-building people. The industries of ship-building and navigation are so wedded by a community of interests that they can not be divorced without mutual destruction. Flourishing ship-yards levy a tribute upon the skill, labor, and resources of a country and direct its attention and energies to sea-going enterprises as nothing else can Even if this were not so, the difficulties of negotiating the purchase on favorable terms of costly steamships in distant countries, or of arranging credits, of securing the faithful construction of types required for particular services and other apparent disadvantages, would be sure to bring disappointment to a people trusting to foreign ship-yards for its marine. This is the view universally taken in Italy, and the aim will be to infuse life and vigor into ship-building establishments.

4. The most serious objection to the free-ship policy in the United States is that its inevitable tendency would be to prevent the successful maintenance of such extensive ship-yards as are essential to build war vessels and transports for offensive and defensive purposes, and thus to deprive the nation of an indispensable means of defense.

If the main object of a revival of the American foreign carrying trade be to secure the profits of the business, as many seem to assume, then we are needlessly wasting our time in seeking any new legislation. Americans have to-day a better opportunity to secure the profits of the carrying trade without troubling Congress than they could possibly have with free-ship legislation. They can buy nearly the whole interest in as many British vessels as they desire; can sail them under British laws much more profitably than they can be sailed under our laws, and pocket the profits in New York counting-rooms as effectually as though they resided in London.

The simple statement of this fact shows that the importance of an American merchant marine arises not so much from the profits of the carrying trade as from considerations of national safety and defense. The legislation adopted by the first Congress under the Constitution in relation to navigation was predicated on the view that an American merchant marine and American ship-yards were essential not only for commercial independence, but also and especially for national security. During the debates on the various measures proposed in that first Congress to insure the construction and use of American vessels (one of which measures was that provision which the pending bill proposes to repeal), Mr. Madison gave utterance in the House of Representatives, May 4, 1789, to the views of the founders of our Government when he said that such legislation was essential because—

> We have maritime dangers to guard against, and we can be secured from them in no other way. * * * We must pay for the national security.

In his celebrated report on commerce Jefferson gave utterance to the same views in the following language:

> Our navigation involves still higher considerations. As a branch of industry it is valuable, but as a resource of defense it is essential. The position and circumstances of the United States leave them nothing to fear from their landboard, and nothing to desire beyond their present rights. But on the seaboard they are open to injury; and they have then, too, a commerce which must be protected. This can only be done by possessing a respectable body of citizen seamen and artists, and establishments in readiness for ship-building.

It seemed clear to such patriots and statesmen as Washington, Madison, and Jefferson that an American merchant marine could be maintained only by building our vessels in home ship-yards, and that such ship-yards were essential for national safety and defense. It is impossible for any nation to maintain navy-yards of sufficient extent to do more than repair public vessels and to slowly construct a few naval vessels in time of peace. Less than 20 per cent. of England's great naval marine was built in her navy-yards. Over 80 per cent. was built in the private ship-yards whose establishment she had encouraged.

Admiral Porter, in his recent testimony before the Senate Naval Committee, referring to the dependence of every nation on its private ship-yards, said:

> As a matter of policy Great Britain encourages private ship-building yards. The salvation of the country in case of war would depend on these; and we should follow the example of Great Britain. * * * When war comes we should have these great ship-building places, with their plant accumulated during peace.

What would have been the result of the appearance of the confederate iron-clad Merrimac in Northern waters if the Government of the United States had been obliged to send to England to have an iron-clad built to cope with her? In all probability if there had not been private ship-yards in this country capable of building a monitor in a hundred days the Merrimac would have appeared in our unprotected harbors as a messenger of destruction, would have broken the blockade of Southern ports, and probably have secured the recognition of the confederacy by France and Great Britain. It is a fact recognized by history that the rebellion was dealt its most deadly blow by the blockading fleet, which cut off its supplies, and this fleet could not have been constructed if we had not possessed extensive private ship-yards. Nearly three hundred vessels, of over 160,000 tons burden, were built for our Navy in our private ship-yards during the civil war, and five hundred vessels were drawn in addition from our merchant marine.

5. The necessity which exists for maintaining extensive private ship-yards, for recourse in case of war, must lead our Government, in the exercise of reasonable prudence, to adopt such a policy as will look to the building of our merchant marine, as well as our ships of war, in this country. Self-defense compels us to dismiss any policy which proposes to rely on England or any other foreign country for whatever vessels we may want, for under such circumstances we should be at the mercy of the nation which built our ships. If we can not now successfully build iron and steel vessels to compete on the open ocean with those built in English yards, because England has the start of us in planting extensive ship-yards, and because she has an advantage in cheaper labor and possession of the foreign carrying trade, it is all the more necessary that we should at once take efficient steps, as a measure of commercial independence and self-protection and national security, to put ourself in a position to compete and build our own vessels.

If our Government would do half as much to encourage our merchant marine and our ship-yards as England has done, we could build up both in the next decade. So far as wooden sailing vessels are concerned, we have been building them since the passage of the act of June 6, 1872, as cheaply, quality for quality, as any other nation. The principal reason that sailing vessels of foreign nations are gradually driving our own sailing vessels out of the foreign trade is because they are subject by law to less charges and burdens than ours.

Iron ship-building is an industry of forty years' growth in England, but scarcely ten in the United States. Indeed it is only five years since the resumption of specie payments gave us a fair chance. In spite of the fact that there has been little demand for American steamships for the foreign trade, because they could not be sailed under as favorable conditions as their English competitors, yet in that brief period iron and steel ship-building has made good progress. Half a dozen yards have been established, machinery designed, skill acquired, many of the obstacles overcome, and the cost of construction, in comparison with the cost of the same in the Clyde yards, steadily reduced. Ten years ago it cost from 30 to 45 per cent. more to build iron and steel steamers here than in England. During the last year this difference in cost has been greatly reduced, until to-day, according to the statements of Messrs. Gorringe and Cramp, of Philadelphia; Roach, of Chester, Pa.; and Gibbons, of Wilmington, Del., iron sailing vessels can be built here at a cost not exceeding 8 per cent., such first-class passenger steamers as cross the Atlantic at a cost not exceeding 12 to 15 per cent., and steamers intended more for freight than for passengers at a cost not exceeding 20 per cent. of that for similar vessels on the Clyde.

Ship-builders express entire confidence that if any means can be devised to create a demand for American vessels by making it profitable to sail them, within ten, if not within five, years they can build iron and steel steamers as low as they can be built in England, provided they are not broken down in the start by the free introduction of foreign-built vessels. They point to the fact that notwithstanding our labor costs more than that of Europe, yet American genius can and does largely overcome this by labor-saving inventions, and by the tendency of even immigrant workmen to accomplish more under the stimulus of our climate, of our more generous living, and of the ambitions aroused by our free institutions.

The first and most obvious duty of Congress is to devise measures that will tend to make it as profitable to sail an American vessel under American laws and conditions as to sail a British ship under British laws and conditions, on the assumption that the first cost is the same. This problem successfully solved, and the problem of the construction of vessels will be easily mastered. It is certain that unless this first problem can be successfully solved few persons will care either to buy British ships or to build American ships for the foreign trade. If the friends of the policy of buying British ships will postpone the free-ship agitation for the present and unite with the friends of the policy of building American ships to secure a successful solution of the first problem it will greatly aid in reaching satisfactory conclusions on the vitally important question of reviving our merchant marine in the foreign trade.

It should be borne in mind that the life of an iron steamer is from thirty to forty, and some claim fifty years, distributing the cost so as not to exceed 2 or, at most, 3 per cent. each year; but the annual expense of running an ocean steamer is nearly 30 per cent. of the first cost of the vessel. This shows of how small consequence is a difference of 12 or 15 per cent. in the first cost of a steamer, distributed over thirty years, as compared with the much greater difference in yearly sailing expenses. Assuming that a first-class passenger iron steamer that can be built for $500,000 in England will cost 14 per cent., or $70,000 more here, and that the annual interest (5 per cent.), depreciation (4 per cent.), and insurance (6 per cent.) on that extra cost will be 2 per cent. per annum on the total cost in excess of that of a British rival, yet this is not more than half the annual charges imposed by law upon an American sailing vessel in the foreign trade.

But I will not argue the question of free ships further. I will, however, appeal to gentlemen, without regard to their views upon the free-ship question, to vote against an amendment calculated to defeat the bill under consideration. The ship-owners of the country unanimously ask for the relief granted by the bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Maine has made a speech, and I propose to reply to him in the remainder of my five minutes. We know that in 1840 we had 83 per cent. of the carrying trade of this country in our own vessels, while the foreign shipping was only about 17 per cent. In 1883 the conditions were reversed entirely. Fifteen per cent. only of our commerce was then carried in our own vessels, and the rest in foreign vessels. That is the condition to-day. How shall we remedy it? Not by this simple section about little things which we have been considering to-day in this bill. but by some vital reform. There is no other way to reach it. You must strike at the real root of the matter. That is what the amendment proposes.

But I do not propose, as my friend from Maine will do me the justice to recollect, to limit it to the completed ship. That is not my intention. I want to go further. I want also the materials of which the ship is made to come in free, in order that we may build ships here. A gentleman from Maine got that law on the statute-books which was read by my friend from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] to-day so that the materials that went into the construction of a wooden ship would be admitted free. That helped Maine. It gave free material to Maine. Now we want free material of iron and steel, including the plates that go to make these great steamships. I hope thus to make the law applicable to Maine and other places, and so that there should be no objection on the part of Maine I have limited it to 3,000 tons, and also excluded from its operation the coastwise trade. Is there anything more liberal than that? Can there be any objection to it?

Therefore I ask gentlemen, inasmuch as we have some time here, and this is perhaps the only opportunity we can have in this session of Congress to act upon this measure, to give me a square vote for it, and if the Senate does not adopt it, I give my friend from Maine my promise that I will do all I can on conference or otherwise to have the bill passed as he reports it here to-day with the simple modifications and ameliorations intended by the bill. But I want to try the Senate on the bill.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, by unanimous consent, reported a bill (H. R. 6770) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I reserve all points of order upon that bill.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. CONVERSE. I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act 5 per cent. of all import duties, payable according to law, shall be remitted on all articles of merchandise imported from any foreign country in vessels of American build and register.

Mr. COX, of New York. I raise the point of order on the proposed substitute of the gentleman from Ohio. I refer the gentleman to a decision made in the last Congress, where on a tariff bill I moved free ships and my amendment was ruled out of order. And that rule operates vice versa.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is not germane.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman from Maine yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REED. If the gentleman desires to speak, I will yield to him to speak now and will take the floor later.

Mr. EATON. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York to change the figure in his amendment from 3,000 to 4,000 tons.

Mr. COX, of New York. I believe I would be authorized by the sentiment around me to make it 3,500 tons.

Mr. EATON. There is scarcely an ocean steamer but has a tonnage of four or five thousand tons.

Mr. COX, of New York. I will call it 4,000 if the gentleman from Connecticut will give me his valuable assistance.

Mr. REED. I think it is a matter of very great regret that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] for the second or third time within my knowledge should present an amendment which if adopted would be well calculated to ruin this bill. The men who are engaged in commerce have repeatedly requested of Congress relief from the burdens which are depicted in the report and a large number of which are removed by this bill. Every man who was a member of the last Congress can recollect that it was precisely this thing which destroyed the bill that was before that Congress.

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. REED. I have only five minutes.

Mr. COX, of New York. I only wish to say that the amendments the gentlemen refers to never went to the Senate. He is mistaken about that.

Mr. REED. I submit to the House it is very undesirable that such a course should be taken now. Let us treat this measure fairly. This is not a political matter. There are certain things here on which we are all agreed. There are some other things, like free ships, on which we are not agreed at all. And the Committee on Shipping, like wise and sensible men, have determined to ignore the questions on which we differed and present a bill involving the questions upon which we agree. Now, shall that wise and sensible harmony be interrupted by the proposition of the gentleman from New York, presented here simply because it is his pet scheme and measure.

I say to this House that the reason why we are not to-day engaged in foreign commerce with large steamers of 4,000 tons burden is not owing to the cost of ships here, but is owing to the impossibility of our engaging in that commerce on equal terms whenever the ships are built. The fact that a vessel is built on the Clyde can never alter the great fact that capital in America upon land is worth 6 per cent. per annum, while capital on the sea is not worth over 4.

And to-day the directors of the Philadelphia Steamship Line are considering a proposition whether they shall offer it for sale. That is a line already owned by Americans. And it makes no difference whatever whether the vessels are built here or abroad, that ineradicable difference of 2 per cent. in the value of capital can never be taken away by the action of the gentleman from New York.

You may ask, then, why do I object to this proposition? The answer is that it goes on the statute-book as an entering-wedge, preventing any of those real measures which will finally result in the revival of American commerce. If you say to me, "Let us reduce the value of capital in the United States," I need not answer that those words are folly. For we can not, in order to compete with all the nations of the world, strike 2 per cent. from the earnings of every dollar in the United States. Do not let us hunt these chimeras any longer. Let us like men face the facts of the situation, and not indulge in any vague vaporings which lead to no honest result in any man's mind. Why bring this question on a bill of this kind? I appeal to you gentlemen who have been misled by this free-ship theory to give way now, and not permit this bill to be clogged by a measure upon which we differ so widely, and for opposing which we can give so good reasons. Do not let us by these quarrels among ourselves deny to the ship-owners of this country these simple measures of relief which are contained in this well-considered and sensible bill.

Mr. COX, of New York. I desire to correct the statement made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] in the warmth of his debate. And I make this statement: In the last Congress, when the bill, after careful consideration, was reported by the committee, it was reported with the understanding that an amendment of free ships and free materials should be offered. That amendment was placed at one time on the bill. The next day the House reconsidered it, and for reasons which I need not stop now to state struck it off. The bill went to the Senate without those provisions. That is the truth.

Mr. REED. I am very glad to give the gentleman from New York an opportunity to tell the truth.

Mr. COX, of New York. The gentleman's little facetiousness I think is very inopportune just now. I am in tolerably good earnest about this, as he is. It touches his wooden-ship interest and it touches my friends who are interested in iron and steel ships. But what I rose to say was that when the bill went to the Senate these propositions were not in it. The bill was held in the Senate for a long time before it was matured, and it came back to this House I think between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning of the 4th of March. I was here, willing to help my friend from Maine pass the bill as it came to the House somewhat lacerated and dislocated, but it was not here from the Senate in time. That is the reason it failed.

Mr. REED. No, sir.

Mr. COX, of New York. Yes, sir, and I appeal to your colleague [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. REED. I think you had better appeal to me first.

Mr. COX, of New York. I appeal unto Cæsar, who is the chief of this business.

Mr. REED. That is so, he is the chief; and he asks this House not to adopt this amendment. Let us follow our leader.

Mr. COX, of New York. But on the matter of fact he is with me.

Mr. REED. Permit me?

Mr. COX, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I remember distinctly the circumstances under which the bill was lost. It was lost under the leadership of a gentleman from Illinois not now a member of this House, and its loss was the result of a somewhat acrimonious debate extending over two days, the debate resulting from the introduction of this very same amendment.

Mr. COX, of New York. It was in the Senate some three or four weeks after that.

Mr. REED. I can not help that. The loss of the bill was the result of that debate, and I make the assertion, which is correct, as all of the members of the House now present well know.

Mr. COX, of New York. Then I come to the proposition before the House, and I shall ask the yeas and nays upon it. This is the only opportunity which we shall have to give to American enterprise the same privileges that all the world has, of going into the markets of the world and buying their vehicles of transportation. Any of us can buy a carriage or other vehicles abroad for transportation. We can buy a locomotive abroad and bring it in under our tariff. But, along with bad literature, ships are the only things absolutely prohibited by this unkind, ungenerous legislation, which has been copied from old English legislation, and which England has long since tabooed as unworthy of any era except that of barbarism.

Mr. DINGLEY. The proposition of the gentleman from New York is not to admit ships subject to duty, but free of duty.

Mr. REED. And I wish to say that the vote on this proposition can not be made a test vote, for I believe a great many men will not permit this bill to be involved with that old and disputed question of free ships. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will not ask for the yeas and nays, and embarrass gentlemen in that way. I appeal to him not to do so.

Mr. EATON. I wish to correct one idea of my friend from Maine [Mr. REED]. He speaks of the difference in the value in capital; that capital on land is worth 6 per cent., while capital on sea is worth only 4 per cent.

I desire to say to my friend that four years ago, and it is known to more than one gentleman on this floor, if the free-ship bill could then have been passed there was pledged $10,000,000 of American capital to be used in purchasing twenty of these ships. That fact, if it be one, and I assert it to be a fact, is an answer to the reasoning of the gentleman from Maine. There were men at that time ready to advance money to go into this enterprise.

Mr. REED. And the reply to that is very simple The fact stated by the gentleman is an anticipated fact; my statement about the Philadelphia ships is an ascertained fact.

Mr. EATON. I do not know about the Philadelphia ships; that has nothing to do with this matter.

Mr. SLOCUM. I regret that my colleague [Mr. COX] has raised this question, because by it he will place in a very false position gentlemen on this side of the House who are just as good friends of the measure which he advocates as he is himself.

With regard to this bill I propose to stand by the policy that was adopted by the committee reporting it. I hold in my hand a report of the committee made in the last Congress. There are communications from more than a hundred different merchants and ship-owners of New York; there is the evidence given orally before my friend's committee of many persons. They all point to certain measures; they all agree on certain measures which they want adopted for the relief of our commercial marine. The committee without a single exception, the three Senators and the three Representatives, all agreed that those should be put into the form of a law.

When at the opening of this session I came to read that report I agreed with my colleagues on the committee that we would select those measures that all had then agreed upon should be adopted and we would embody them in a bill and stand by that bill; that the things that were in dispute we would leave outside of the bill, and this free-ship question was one of them. I do not want to see this bill beaten by bringing in a question about which we differ. There is no dissenting voice on the bill as it stands to-day; we all agree to it as we all ought to.

I am in favor of this proposition by itself; but I am opposed to jeopardizing this bill by introducing upon it this amendment. My colleague [Mr. COX, of New York] is no better friend than I am of the theory of allowing our people to purchase ships wherever they choose. I believe it is a great measure, which would relieve our carrying trade. But if you put it on this bill you seal the fate of the bill beyond redemption. It will be defeated, as it was last year. I hope that the friends of the bill (whatever may be their views in regard to free ships) will vote against this amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move the formal amendment to strike out the last word. I understand that the proposition introduced by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] in regard to a reduction of 5 per cent. on the duties on goods used in ship-building was ruled out of order. The only question, then, before us is whether this amendment to allow free registry to ships of over 4,000 tons burden will kill the bill. The title declares it to be a bill "to encourage American foreign carrying trade." If I believed such would be its effect, I would, contrary to my convictions, vote against the amendment. But in view of the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] that if the Senate should strike out this proposed provision he then will decline to press it any further, I do not see why the adoption of this provision by the House at this time can endanger the ultimate passage of the bill. If the Senate should desire to get rid of it, that body can strike it out, and when the bill comes back we can agree to it in that shape. But without this amendment what is the relief to be given by the bill? It would not build up our foreign carrying trade. To attempt such a great work by it alone would be like feeding an elephant with goat's milk. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] has said that the difference in the interest in money here and in England will forever prevent the building up of a merchant marine until that difference is wiped out by the course of trade. That is true; and there is nothing for us to do but to wait until that event shall occur or to offer some extra inducements for capital to go in this direction. I do not know whether that is wise or not. When I used to read in history of Napoleon pointing out to the great British statesman the little island and saying: "What a small space England occupies on the earth," I sympathized with the Englishman's grand reply: "But with her commerce she circles the world." But since I have seen our rapid development on land, our magnificent stretches of railways cutting through the mountains and cleaving the plains, I rather feel a grander pride that we build railroads which must be kept up, affording labor to men, while England follows only the ocean-path that God with the elements repairs. And now I do not care whether our money goes into ships. If our capital brings better interest on land, if it feeds poverty, if it furnishes work for muscle, I shall never regret that it is expended upon American soil. But in the name of common sense, if we are to encourage American foreign carrying trade let us do something that looks like encouragement, that is encouragement. [Applause.]

Mr. SLOCUM. I move the previous question upon the amendment of my colleague [Mr. COX, of New York].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on adopting the amendment offered in the form of an additional section by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX, of New York. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 69, not voting 142; as follows:

Mr. WILKINS with Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. HERBERT with Mr. KELLEY.

Mr. MAYBURY with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. HOUSEMAN with Mr. SMALLS.

Mr. CARLETON with Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. BOYLE. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. WOOD. I am paired with Mr. RAY, of New Hampshire, and have refrained from voting. If he were here, I would vote in favor of this proposition for free ships.

The vote was then announced as above recorded. [Applause.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I move the following additional section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 21. That the expense of maintaining the Marine-Hospital Service shall be defrayed out of the receipts from the tonnage tax hereinbefore provided for, and so much thereof as may be necessary is hereby appropriated for that purpose

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add to that the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That section 15 of this act shall not take effect until the 1st day of July, 1887.

Mr. DIBBLE. I make the point of order that section 15 has been passed.

The SPEAKER. Still it would be in order to insert the provision here.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I hope the amendment providing that the expense of the Marine-Hospital Service shall be defrayed out of the tonnage tax will not be adopted, for the reason, if adopted, there will be a claim one or two years hence for the retention of the tonnage tax; and as I believe that tax is a tax on every farmer in the Northwest who sends his grain to the markets of the world, I trust that within a short time it will be reduced or removed, so that they may be relieved of this burden. I hope the House will consider that the provision that the cost of this service shall be paid out of this particular fund is objectionable and is not in the line of economy. In the end it comes out of the public Treasury, at least as I understand it. As to the amendment to the amendment, I think it should be 1885 at least, because perhaps we shall not have a sufficient appropriation for 1884.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It seems to me that as the hospital service arises out of the mercantile marine of the country, its expense ought to be defrayed by that branch of our business for which the expenditure is incurred. The effect of my amendment is to charge the money spent for the sailors upon the ships, and that is the place were it ought to be charged; and no consideration that hereafter the tonnage tax may be repealed has any weight in arguing against that proposition, because if we did not have the tonnage tax it ought to be put on in order to defray this hospital service.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York. I hope the House will not sustain the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York. If any remedial measures are to be passed at all, and as the amendment which I proposed to section 15 was passed by the House, I submit that it ought to go into effect immediately and not be postponed until 1887. The purpose of the amendment is very patent. Its effect would be the destruction of the other section that has been passed by the House, and I call upon the members of this body not to support the amendment postponing the operation of this law until 1887. No reason has been assigned by the gentleman from Indiana why the operation of the act should be postponed to 1887, and it is safe to assume that if any reason could be urged the gentleman would be the first to discover it.

Mr. SLOCUM. I now demand the previous question upon the pending amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana to the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 97.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The point of order being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. SLOCUM were appointed tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. At the suggestion of several gentlemen around me that a quorum perhaps is not present I will not insist upon the demand.

So (the point of order being withdrawn, and no further count being demanded) the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I now wish to offer an amendment in the shape of a new section to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is pending. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, which has been offered as an additional section.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the last section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. —. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed; and this act shall take effect and be in force on and after July 1, 1884.

Mr. SLOCUM. I now move the previous question upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have an amendment to offer.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I had asked the recognition of the Chair before the gentleman demanded the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman at that time. Several gentlemen have informed the Chair that they desired to offer amendments.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Then I ask whether the gentleman from New York can move the previous question while amendments are still to be offered to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. This question is before the House as in Committee of the Whole, is it not?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The previous question has been demanded.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. My proposition is to offer an additional section to this bill, proposing to allow free material for ship building to come in.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope the gentlemen from New York will not insist upon the demand for the previous question. I want to offer an amendment which will allow free materials to our ship-builders, so as to place them upon a full equality with ship-builders of foreign countries.

Mr. COX, of New York. We promised to give them free material also as a complement to free ships. I hope my colleague will yield for that purpose.

Several members demanded the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I hope those in favor of allowing free material to our ship-builders will vote down the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes 25.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I make the point of no quorum.

Several MEMBERS. Too late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point is not made too late. A quorum not having voted, the Chair appoints as tellers the gentlemen from New York [Mr. SLOCUM] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADAMS].

The House divided; and the tellers reported ayes 125.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois (one of the tellers). I withdraw the demand for further count.

So (further count not being called for) the previous question was ordered.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I merely wanted to have it known that I was offering a proposition for free material.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SLOCUM. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered—only six members voting therefor.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SLOCUM moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF THURMAN ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky desires to make a privileged report from the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, reported a bill (H. R. 6771) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also, to amend an act approved July 2, 1864; and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of the said first-mentioned act; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am directed by the committee to ask permission for any of its members to have printed with the report of the committee separate views on the bill.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HOLMES, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes.

And then, on motion of Mr. BAYNE (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLOUNT: Petition of citizens of Butts County, Georgia, asking for the passage of the Senate bill in aid of education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. W. W. BROWN: Memorial of Scofield Post, No. 49, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, in favor of the recommendation of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, memorial setting forth a sure remedy for mouth-and-foot disease of cattle—to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, memorial of Bradford Post, No. 141, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, in favor of the recommendation of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CALKINS: Petition of Houghton Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, praying for pensions for all honorably discharged soldiers—to the same committee.

By Mr. CRISP: Petition of J. A. Tomberlin, S. D. Fuller, S. Bowen, D. Johnson, and others, citizens of Wilcox County, Georgia, for the passage of the Blair educational bill—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. CURTIN: Resolutions of the John F. Croll Post, No. 156, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, and resolutions of the William J. Wise Camp, Sons of Veterans, of Pennsylvania, indorsing the recommendation of the pension committee, Grand Army of the Republic—severally to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. L. H. DAVIS: Petition of citizens of New Madrid, Mo., for an appropriation for building levees on the Mississippi River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. EATON: Papers relating to the claim of John B. McDonnell—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ERMENTROUT: Memorial of Boyd & Hicken, and others, of New York, in favor of the repeal of all tonnage duties—to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, for passage of H. R. 5892, known as the Dingley pilotage bill, and for an appropriation for the Hydrographic Department—to the same committee.

Also, memorial of the Maritime Association of New York, for relief of American shipping—to the same committee.

Also, petition of Jacob Knabb and numerous citizens of the eighth Congressional district of Pennsylvania, for a pension to Mrs. Rebecca Kupp—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HAMMOND: Petition of G. A. Weaver and others, of Upson County, Georgia, in favor of aid to education—to the Committee on Education.

By Mr. KEIFER: Petition of Frank A. Kates, recording secretary Mad River Assembly, Knights of Labor, Springfield, Ohio, and 100 others of the same place, relative to the Chinese restriction act—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. KLEINER: Resolutions of Dela Hunt Post, No. 152, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, for the equalization of bounty, &c.—to Select Committee on Payment of Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay.

By Mr. S. W. PEEL: Papers relating to the claim of Leonard M. Thompson—to the Committee on War Claims.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 28, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. J. E. IRISH, D. D., American consul at Cognac, France.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 14th instant, a report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office relative to an alleged error in the survey of the eastern boundary of California; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FARLEY. I present a memorial of the Manufacturers' Association of California, signed by a large number of manufacturers. It is short, and I ask that it be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Patents, as follows:

To our honorable Senators and Representatives from California in the Congress of the United States:

The Manufacturers' Association of California respectfully address you this memorial in relation to the present situation regarding patents for inventions, and earnestly invoke your active opposition to such bills as have been or hereafter may be introduced into either branch of the national Congress hostile to the progress of science and the useful arts by limiting the just protection to their respective discoveries and appliances.

It is with surprise and fear that we have recently learned of bills greatly impairing if not practically destroying the rights heretofore conferred upon inventors having been favorably considered by the House of Representatives, and we view with anxiety the action of the honorable Senate upon them and with alarm the consequences which may follow their enactment.

We consider the proposed changes radical and unjust, and liable to seriously injure many and great existing interests, and prevent completion of numerous prospective enterprises, by withdrawal of capital and confidence, and raising perilous obstacles to our country's inventive, industrial, and manufacturing progress.

We therefore earnestly and most respectfully protest against the proposed changes and all similar provisions which abridge the usefulness of the Patent Office Department or impair the protection heretofore afforded.

In presenting this request and protest we beg to remind you of some great facts of history which are a part of the common knowledge of the world, namely:

That the general advance of each civilized nation in knowledge and intelligence, in enjoyment of increased comforts and luxuries, and accumulation of wealth has been greatest where inventors are best protected, and that this advance is chiefly due to their discoveries and productions.

That the patent laws do not, nor have they ever given the inventor anything beyond an exclusive right for limited time to use or sell that which he had himself created. For this reason the country has lost nothing nor can it lose anything by continuing the patent laws, as wisely provided for in the Constitution of the United States, in all their force and integrity.

That the great inventions and useful discoveries made by inventors in the United States have constituted an advance highway, on which our country marches, a proud leader of the nations of the world in all that makes a people intelligent, comfortable, rich, happy, and independent.

That under the incentive and protection afforded to inventors by our patent laws inventions and improvements have multiplied rapidly, furnishing easier and cheaper methods for agriculture, manufacturing, mining, transportation, and travel.

That the hours of daily labor have been reduced, while the means of livelihood, with enlarged comfort in our homes, have been greatly increased through the changes these inventions have wrought.

The benefits derived by the country from inventive genius and mechanic skill are so immeasurably greater than inventors have gained from the people that comparison ceases.

Referring to these general truths, we send you this memorial, protesting against the threatened action inimical to the patent laws, and earnestly soliciting your hearty efforts toward continuing the wise policy which has added so much toward the expansion, prosperity, strength, and glory of our nation, and respectfully express our desire that you will exercise your influence to preserve the body and intent of our patent system, and that all changes be confined to details for correction of abuses and to make it more effective.

Respectfully, yours,

THE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I present a similar memorial of the Manufacturers' Association of California, remonstrating against proposed legislation by Congress inimical to the present patent laws and impairing the rights of inventors. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I present the petition of Thomas Ashby and 52 other citizens of Massachusetts, who call upon Congress in the name of the intelligent workers of the United States to enact "such amendments to the Chinese restriction acts as are satisfactory to the Pacific coast delegation in Congress." They represent that such is the administration of the law on the Pacific coast by the officials there at this time as to break down all barriers, and every class of Chinese, whether merchants, laborers, mendicants, or criminals, may enter our ports under the name of business men, students, or travelers, and they demand, they say, therefore, in the name of American artisans, "that Congress shall enact such amendments to the Chinese restriction acts as will make it a criminal offense to bring to this country such hordes of degraded beings, who are a worse blight to the country than ever was the slave power of the South."

Mr. President, I recognize the right of all my constituents to petition Congress at all times upon all subjects when they deem it their duty or their inclination so to do, and I shall present such petitions, but whether I could support such amendments to the Chinese immigration law as would be "satisfactory to the Pacific coast delegation in Congress" would depend altogether upon the character of those amendments. While I shall be the organ of my constituents to the extent of presenting their petition, I withhold my assent to amendments until I shall know the character of such amendments.

I think the petition had better be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The bill has been reported to the Senate, and I think the petition had better lie on the table.

Mr. DAWES. As the committee have reported, let the petition lie on the table.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I present a petition praying for a fast-mail train from Boston to New York, signed by the president of the Central National Bank of Portsmouth, N. H., Hon. Frank Jones, a former member of Congress, and a large number of business men. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented the petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., praying for the passage of a law suspending the coinage of silver dollars and for the discontinuance of bills of the denomination of one and two dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a petition of citizens of Groton, Dak., and a petition of citizens of Dodge Center, Minn., praying that all qualified physicians may have equal rights in the Government service; which were referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LOGAN. I present the petition of a great many citizens known as inventors and a set of resolutions that they have agreed upon. The petition is in the following language:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, inventors, manufacturers, and citizens of Chicago and vicinity, respectfully petition our honorable Senators and Representatives to oppose by all legitimate means the pending legislation in Congress hostile to the progress of American invention.

This petition is circulated in accordance with the following resolutions, unanimously adopted at a meeting of the citizens of Chicago and vicinity, held in this city March 24, 1884.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

We, as the representative inventors and manufacturers of Chicago, having in view the object and scope of our patent law as now embodied in the statutes of this country and construed by the decisions of the courts, and believing all proposed legislation upon the subject of letters patent now before Congress to be vicious in its end and purpose, and destructive to the rights of all inventors or manufacturers under letters patent; and having in view especially section 2 of an act recently passed in the House of Representatives under suspension of the rules and referred to the Committee on Patents of the Senate, and the same having been reported back to the Senate unanimously that it pass, as follows:

Section 2 of the act: "That when in any case the use complained of was an article or device made by the defendant, or his agent, or employé, for his own use and benefit, and not in the manufacture of an article for sale, the measure of recovery shall be a license fee. If in any such case a license fee shall not have been established under the patent or patents sued on, then in any action at law the jury, and in any action in equity the court, shall ascertain what, under all the circumstances of the case, would be a reasonable license fee: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to machinery held for sale or used for manufacturing purposes:" Now, therefore,

Be it resolved, That under the emergency existing for immediate action, we hereby express our condemnation and disapproval of the above act, principally for the reasons that it destroys all vested rights of inventors and owners of patents in their property or of using the same in any instance for their own protection, and is, in fact, a license and an invitation to all pirates and violators of patent property to appropriate the inventions of others, leaving to the inventors and owners of patents only the bare possibility of collecting an uncertain sum, to be determined by the uncertainties of a jury or judge, at the termination of a necessarily tedious and expensive litigation; and

Be it further resolved, For the above and other cogent reasons, that there be expressed by petition that the above act, and all other acts now pending of an analogous character, are destructive to the rights of inventors and detrimental in the highest degree to constitutional and guaranteed rights of inventors in the progress of science and the useful arts; also

Be it resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded immediately to the Representatives and Senators, to be acted upon at once in the spirit of these resolutions; and that petitions be at once circulated among the inventors and manufacturers and all citizens, that they may express their protest against such unjust and class legislation, and that no further Congressional action be taken upon the above act until the will of the people is thus expressed by petition.

Be it resolved, That we have an entire confidence in the high honor, justice, and ability of our Representatives and Senators, and believe that the above designated and all analogous legislative action has been sprung upon them by designing men, having in view the supposed grievances of the few, without regard to or due consideration of the great interests and principles involved in the issue.

The petition which I present is eighty feet in length, and signed by numerous inventors and persons interested in patented articles. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented the petition of Robert B. Patton, late private Company I, Second Regiment of Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, praying that Robert C. McKee, late private Company G, Twentieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, be restored to the pension-rolls; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LOGAN. I present resolutions of the Board of Trade of Chicago in reference to the transportation of goods in bond connected with foreign trade, and quite a number of resolutions suggesting amendments to the law as it now exists, and also amendments to bills which have been offered. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that the amendments suggested in the resolutions may be incorporated in the RECORD, so that Senators can have an opportunity of examining them. They have been very carefully considered.

The paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Copy of resolutions adopted by the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago, April 22, 1884.

Resolved, That this board heartily indorse the action of the special committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in reference to international bills of lading, as set forth in their report adopted March 6, 1884; and that this board, fully appreciating the importance of the object desired, pledges itself to co-operate with the said Chamber of Commerce by urging upon our Representatives in Congress their hearty support of the proposed measure when it shall come before them for action.

But inasmuch as a large foreign business is done from Chicago and other inland cities in this country on through bills of lading issued by the various inland rail and water transportation companies in connection with ocean lines and other ocean vessels, they recommend and earnestly urge that the proposed law shall be so amended that it shall apply equally to all goods so carried under such bills of lading; otherwise, in the event of a law such as that proposed being passed without including in its provisions all goods shipped on through bills of lading from interior points, the seaboard exporter would be at a decided advantage over his Western competitor, in that the former would be able to insist upon and receive a bill of lading much more valuable than the latter.

Besides, unless it shall be made to so apply, the law could be practically nullified in so far at least as would pertain to that portion of the vessel's cargo consisting of goods on through bills of lading issued by parties or corporations other than the owners, agents, or masters of ocean vessels; and your committee recommend that the various sections of the proposed law be so changed, as follows:

Section 1: After the word "States," in second line, insert "and every railway company, transportation company, or fast-freight line, and every vessel plying on the inland lakes or other water ways within the United States that issue through foreign bills of lading on behalf of or in connection with vessels."

Section 2: After the word "manager," in the second line, insert "or the owners, manager, or agents of any railway company, transportation company, or fast-freight line, or of any vessel plying on the inland lakes or other water ways within the United States carrying goods on a through bill of lading to be delivered at the seaboard to any vessel to be transported by said vessel on the high seas."

Section 3: After the word "manager," in second line, insert the words, "or the owners, managers, or agents of any railway company, transportation company, or fast-freight line, or of any vessel plying on the inland lakes or other water ways within the United States, carrying goods on a through bill of lading, to be delivered at the seaboard to any vessel, to be thence transported by said vessel on the high seas."

Section 5: After the words "refusal of," in fourth line, insert the words, "any public carrier," and after the word "agent," in same line, insert the words, "of any vessel;" also, in same section, after the word "such" and before the word "vessel," in the eighth line, insert the words "public carrier, or."

Section 6: After the word "manager" insert "or any railway company, transportation company, or fast-freight line, or any vessel plying on the inland lakes or other water ways within the United States, carrying goods on a through bill of lading, to be delivered at the seaboard to any vessel, to be thence transported by said vessel on the high seas, their owners, managers, or agents."

Mr. LOGAN presented an affidavit of Zack T. Hundley, a citizen of Dakota, in support of a bill heretofore introduced for the relief of William T. Hundley; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of A. Lincoln Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska; a petition of Bob Mercer Post, No. 145, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska; and a petition of Boomer Post, No. 118, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, praying certain pension legislation; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of Bradford Post, No. 141, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania; a petition of Bryson Post, No. 225, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania; and a petition of Taggart Post, No. 350, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, in favor of the recommendations of the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in relation to pensions, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, in favor of an appropriation for the support of the Hydrographic Department; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented the petition of the Commercial Exchange of Philadelphia, in favor of the redemption of the trade-dollar; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PENDLETON presented resolutions adopted by W. H. Doering Post, No. 248, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Ohio, Antwerp, Ohio, and resolutions adopted by Bishop Williams Post, Grand Army of the Republic, Shade, Athens County, Ohio, praying such legislation as is recommended by the pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a resolution adopted by Col. Jacob Smith Post, No. 72, Grand Army of the Republic, at Trenton, Mo., indorsing the suggestions of a committee appointed by the Grand Army of the Republic on the subject of pensions, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of Franklin Shanks Post, No. 100, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Missouri, indorsing the action and recommendations of the committee on pensions of the National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, as follows:

First. Pensions to be granted disabled ex-prisoners without requiring proof that disability is the result of imprisonment.

Second. The extension of the arrears act until January, 1885.

Third. The increase of widows' pensions from $8 to $12 per month.

Fourth. Proof of soundness prior to enlistment to be assumed in the absence of an adverse record.

Fifth. Increase of pension for the totally or partially maimed.

Sixth. Increase of pension of minor children to $5 per month.

Seventh. Continuation of soldier's pension to widow or dependent relatives, regardless of causes of death.

Eighth. Pensions for all honorably discharged ex-soldiers and sailors now disabled and dependent on their own labor for a support and have reached 65 years of age without requiring proof of the origin of their disability.

Ninth. Proof of physical disability and dependence upon others than those legally bound for their support, together with the fact that the soldier or sailor left no widow or minor child, to be sufficient to entitle dependent parents to pension.

Tenth. Legislation defining the status of pension-clients and their attorneys.

Eleventh. An equitable equalization of bounties.

Also, by unanimous resolution of said post at a regular meeting, the following is respectfully submitted:

That when an applicant for invalid pension dies, either from effect of disease contracted in the service or otherwise, after having filed his declaration and before the same has been finally settled, the widow or surviving children should have the legal right conferred on them to prosecute said claim to a conclusion, and in the event of the original claimant being found entitled to pension then the widow, if alive, should receive what was due said applicant at the time of his death, or in case of her death his children should be entitled to receive the same.

This petition is numerously signed by members of that post I move that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1641) for the relief of the widow of Edward M. Wilkins, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the following bills were referred, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 962) to grant a pension to James M. Kirk;

A bill (S. 963) to place on the pension-roll the name of Philenda Carran, mother of Francis M. Carran, late a private in Company B, One hundred and twenty-first Regiment New York Volunteers; and

A bill (S. 202) for the relief of John L. Cunningham.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 56) for the relief of Martin and P. B. Murphy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them adversely; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 826) to provide for the appointment of a commission to investigate the subject of railroad transportation;

A bill (S. 840) to establish a board of railroad commissioners, to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. 1142) to establish a board of commissioners of interstate commerce, prescribe the duties thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Railroads, reported a bill (S. 2112) to establish a commission to regulate interstate commerce, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William Young, late private in Company F, Twenty-third Michigan Infantry, praying for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Ruben Marshall;

A bill (H. R. 570) granting a pension to N. H. Clements; and

A bill (H. R. 562) granting a pension to H. E. Van Trees.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 484) granting a pension to Charles H. Noble, submitted an adverse report thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the Senator if the bill shows from what State the applicant comes?

Mr. PLUMB. That case, I think, is from Kansas.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not remember the State the soldier lived in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The Chair is informed that the person mentioned in the bill was a member of an Illinois regiment. The residence is not stated.

Mr. PLUMB. I ask that the last four bills reported by the Senator from Illinois from the Committee on Pensions be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. CULLOM. I think I know, perhaps, the cases to which the Senator from Kansas refers. There are three cases where the parties were in the Kansas State militia, and in that service suffered severely and are disabled. The committee report against the bills granting pensions to these persons for the reason that they had nothing to do with the service of the Government of the United States. I suppose those are the cases to which the Senator refers.

Mr. PLUMB. I want those three cases and the case of Mr. Noble, the last one reported, placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the votes severally indefinitely postponing these bills will be reconsidered, and the bills will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse reports of the committee. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CAMDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 784) granting a pension to James S. Donahue, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. CAMDEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and they were indefinitely postponed:

A bill (S. 1200) granting a pension to Mrs. E. G. C. Abbott; and

A bill (S. 1676) granting a penson to John F. Hinman.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2066) providing for a resurvey of township 12 south, of range 27 east, in Putnam County, Florida, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2113) for the relief of Emile V. Audibert; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, introduced a bill (S. 2114) granting a pension to Alonzo Raymond; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LAPHAM (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2115) for the relief of Abraham Van Assum; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (S. 2116) for the relief of Henry Starr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2117) for the relief of Mathilda Victor; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 2118) granting a pension to James E. O'Shea; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KENNA introduced a bill (S. 2119) for the relief of Dudley D. Smith in his own right and as administrator of Whitcomb Smith, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the papers on file relating to the case, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2120) granting a pension to Milley Ann McGinnis, widow of John McGinnis; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BECK introduced a bill (S. 2121) for the relief of Wilson Ryan; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GEORGE (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2122) for the relief of John L. Lake, jr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print the report of the National Academy of Sciences.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker;

A bill (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall.

The message further announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4716) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WALDO HUTCHINS of New York, Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. W. H. CALKINS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5459) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. R. W. TOWNSHEND of Illinois, Mr. W. S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. R. G. HORR of Michigan managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup;

A bill (H. R. 709) granting a pension to Robert L. Willey;

A bill (H. R. 1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough;

A bill (H. R. 1631) to increase the pension of Mathew O. Regan;

A bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon;

A bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to Decatur Hamlin;

A bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair;

A bill (H. R. 2908) granting a pension to James McManus;

A bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Azzur W. Reader;

A bill (H. R. 3656) granting a pension to Salome Ann Walker;

A bill (H. R. 4041) granting a pension to Zelica T. Dunlap.

A bill (H. R. 5213) to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 5215) granting a pension to Orlando Culver; and

A bill (H. R. 5686) granting a pension to Sarah J. Chipman.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 6073) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1884, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 26th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1252) for the relief of Millie E. Hays, widow of John Hays, deceased.

THE CALENDAR—BILLS PASSED OVER.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair.) If there be no "concurrent or other resolutions" the Chair lays before the Senate the first case upon the Calendar under Rule VIII, being the bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased. This case, by the order of the Senate, is to stand without prejudice until the return of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The Chair lays before the Senate the next case on the Calendar, which is the bill (S. 139) for the relief of C. M. Wilcox. The Chair understands unanimous consent has been given that that case shall remain without prejudice until the return of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], and a like consent was given in regard to the bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, to continue during the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. Order of Business 272, being Senate bill 1477, is the next business in order on the Calendar.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been read, and the question now is upon the adoption of a pending amendment, which will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 27, the Committee on the District of Columbia report to strike out the following words:

> The sum which may be expended under this act shall be treated and regarded as a part of the general expenses of the District of Columbia, and the United States shall be credited with the amount which it may pay under this act for the erection of said bridge upon its 50 per cent. of the expenses of the District of Columbia, as provided in the act of June 11, 1878, entitled "An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia."

And to insert in lieu thereof—

> One-fourth of the expense of the construction of said bridge shall be charged to and paid by the District of Columbia, and the balance (three-fourths) of the sum hereby appropriated shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER], and with his assent I shall hope to get the consent of the Senate, to let the bill go over without losing its place on the Calendar, if possible, until the Committee on the District of Columbia can investigate to its own satisfaction certain facts that I, as a member of that committee, deem it material should be thoroughly investigated before the Senate proceeds with the consideration of this bill. I do not want to delay its consideration; I prefer that it shall hold its place on the Calendar, so that it may be called up at any time when the committee has had an opportunity of investigating the matters to which I refer. But sooner than allow the consideration to proceed I shall feel bound to object, in order that we may investigate those matters to our satisfaction before proceeding with the consideration.

If the suggestion I make meets the approval of the Senator from Virginia, I will ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over and hold its place on the Calendar. Is the Senator from Virginia willing to have that course pursued?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I am not, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I object to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I thought the Senator was going to permit me to answer him before he filed his objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I withdraw the objection for that purpose, but I understood the Senator as answering in the briefest and most emphatic possible manner, and that is the reason why I proceeded to make my objection.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; I propose to ask the Senate, if the Senator from Tennessee insists upon his objection, to take up the bill notwithstanding the objection. If the bill has not friends enough to take it up, I assume that it will not have friends enough to pass it.

The reason why I do not consent to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee is because there is no new matter to go back to the committee. The Senator from Tennessee I understand has been upon that committee for some years past. I think I heard him speaking of preserving the consistency of his record upon that committee for a number of years past. If there is one single paper filed here since the bill was reported that was not before that committee as far back as 1881, then I shall quickly consent even to recommitting the bill. I have been in that committee-room, and I find there every paper filed in 1881 that has been filed by Wells, Duncan & Co. since they have ascertained that the Committee on the District of Columbia first reported the bill favorably. Every paper is filed save and except only the report of Bvt. Brig. Gen. W. B. Hazen, which is addressed to a private citizen with an official title. That is the only one.

There is no question for the Senate to consider that any member of it can possibly desire to have referred back to that committee but the one which proceeds from the lessees of the bridge, who ask the Congress of the United States to pay the judgment liens that rest to-day more heavily upon those piers than the rotten structure which is called a bridge and which we are asked to buy in addition. That is all that it can be desired to have referred back, and I say that the Senate ought to be prepared now to hear it; it ought to be prepared to pass upon it.

If there is any question that the Senator from Tennessee will say has not been thoroughly considered and name what question it is, and if I can understand that it is a question which has not been considered, I shall quickly assent to his proposition. But I can not see it. I have been three months with this bill before the committee and before the Senate. I know that the bill has been prejudiced by a suggestion of its defeat elsewhere. That is a great mistake. This bill has not been defeated anywhere. The bill which has suffered defeat is just the bill that it is proposed to model this one after by amendments; that is, to make Congress pay the judgment liens of the Alexandria Canal Company and to pay Wells, Duncan & Co. $85,000 for property that they do not own a cent of and never have owned.

I want this bill to stand upon its merits, and to stand upon the report of the committee; and if the Senator from Tennessee can not show me some specific question that he wants reconsidered, I must ask that the Senate take up the bill notwithstanding his objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I certainly have no objection to the Senator's asking the Senate to take the bill up notwithstanding the objection. That is his right. I have habitually favored a free bridge across the Potomac for years. I still favor the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac. My recollection is, however, that for the last six years a majority of that committee, if not with unanimity, has preferred the Aqueduct Bridge to any other locality for a bridge across the Potomac. I have preferred it, and my judgment is that it is the proper place for the bridge. Our difficulty has been heretofore that we have never seen that we could acquire a title that we could ask the Senate to accept for the piers or for the Aqueduct Bridge. The present chairman of the committee [Mr. INGALLS], in whose legal opinions I have very great confidence, informed the committee at the meeting next before the last that in his opinion the matter had now assumed an attitude in which we could secure an absolute title clear and satisfactory.

If that can be done I prefer the Aqueduct Bridge to the bridge at the Three Sisters, and though I favored the report of the bill that the Senator now presses, believing as I did at that time that it was impossible to obtain title to the Aqueduct Bridge and being earnestly in favor of a free bridge across the Potomac, and I took that as the last resort, I shall never favor the passage of this bill until I have ascertained with absolute certainty that we can not acquire a satisfactory title to the Aqueduct Bridge.

I therefore renew my objection to the further consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee objects, and the bill goes over under the rule. The Senator from Virginia now moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1477, being the bill which has just gone over. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the rule the motion is not debatable. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN. I do not wish the Senator from Virginia to be misled as to the course that some of us as members of the committee will take on his proposition. As the Senator from Tennessee has stated, I favor, and very earnestly favor, the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac at one or other of the points designated. But in view of the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee I shall be unwilling to vote to take up this bill at this time and act upon it until that question is investigated. The Senator from Virginia stated that no doubt any one who would be willing to vote for the bill would be willing to vote to take it up. I should vote for the bill if it was on its passage, but I shall not vote to take it up now until the question has been investigated. I think it would be wiser for the Senator from Virginia to accept the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee, and let the bill hold its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. I prefer that if it be possible.

Mr. BROWN. So I understand; but if the Senator from Virginia will not accept that and shall press his motion to take it up, as one member of the committee I shall be obliged to vote against it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand the Chair to state that the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable; all the debate has proceeded so far by the indulgence of the Senate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I simply wish to state, with the indulgence of the Senate, that I can perfectly understand how, by a majority vote against taking up this bill on the motion now made, its standing may be prejudiced.

Mr. HARRIS. That will be the result.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. But I understand perfectly, too, that I have had ninety days' notice of this same contest. There is nothing new in it; it is the same old contest that has existed since 1881; and I had just as well accept the situation now as at any other time. There is nothing in it but the same old Wells and Duncan fight against a free bridge, for it is perfectly understood that the title to that old bridge still——

Mr. HARRIS. I beg to say to the Senator from Virginia, if he will allow me, that if he attributes any declaration of mine or any act of mine to Wells or Duncan or anything except a sense of duty, he makes an insinuation unworthy of himself and altogether unjust to me and one that is utterly without foundation. I have never seen and do not know either of the persons to whom he refers.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I would have supposed that the Senator's years of experience would have restrained him from suspecting even for a moment that I was making a charge against him. I do mean to say this and this only: that but for the papers filed here by Wells, Duncan & Co., and printed and laid around indiscriminately, there never would have been a proposition to recommit this bill, because there would have been no suggestion of a reason for it to the mind of the Senator from Tennessee or anybody else. The reason he asks for it is because of the suggestions made by these papers of Wells, Duncan & Co.

I hope the Senator understands better now. That is what I meant by the suggestion I made and all that I meant. I made no reflection upon the Senator's course in this matter. But I do say that the Senator from Tennessee ought to know that there can not be a title acquired to that property unless we assent to the conditions laid down in their papers which have been laid upon the desks of Senators here and of gentlemen in the other end of the Capitol that we shall pay the judgment liens upon their old bridge and pay them $85,000, and then rebuild the old bridge, rebuild the aqueduct, and ask Congress, according to the reports of the engineers, for half a million dollars to do it with.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Virginia allow me? The question he refers to is a legal one. He gives his opinions as to the possibility of acquiring title to the piers of the Aqueduct Bridge. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, expressed an opinion at the meeting before the last to the committee directly the other way; and the Senator will pardon me for saying that I have quite as much—I will not say more, but if he were present I should be bound to say more—confidence in the legal opinions of the Senator from Kansas than I have in those of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator must understand that I accept that; but the Senator from Kansas has no legal opinion upon this question which he will vouchsafe to the Senate, and the Senator from Tennessee, with all due deference to him, I undertake to say, will not vouchsafe an opinion on that question.

Mr. HARRIS. I only want time to investigate it to see what I shall conclude.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I would be willing to give time, but there ought to be some distinction drawn between time and eternity. This question has been pending ever since 1854, and it is in the Supreme Court of the United States to-day, and as long as Wells, Duncan & Co. control it there it will remain. I am asking for a free bridge that this generation may possibly have an opportunity of passing over, and not wait until the conclusion of the litigation which commenced in 1854 and is still pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, with half a dozen other cases appealable following it, to determine whether we are to have a free bridge or not. That is the important question, and that is the reason I ask that the bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. PIKE. Mr. President, I think the request of the Senator from Tennessee is a reasonable one and ought to be yielded to by the Senator from Virginia. It is only a difference of a week. It leaves the bill on the Calendar and it will come up as soon as the Committee on the District of Columbia can have an opportunity to examine the papers. The Senator from Tennessee may know about these papers; he has been on the committee some time; but quite a number of us have not. Those papers that have been talked about were not printed until a few days ago and have not been examined by the committee. I believe there is no opposition in the committee on the part of anybody to the proposition that there ought to be a free bridge. The only question of division is whether or not we shall utilize the present bridge, the Aqueduct Bridge, as it is called, or build an entirely new one. The papers recently presented and the propositions recently submitted to the committee the committee can examine next Friday and it can be settled then. It is quite likely that there will be no division of sentiment about it. If it is persisted in, I think the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill now ought to be voted down, so that the committee may have an opportunity to consider this new matter recently printed and recently presented to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again ask for consent to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. Do I understand the Senator from Virginia to consent to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this bill stand over without losing its place upon the Calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and consent is given. The next bill on the Calendar will be reported.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I did not understand the proposition.

Mr. HARRIS. My objection, then, will be considered withdrawn, Mr. President.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I ask the Senate to take up this bill, notwithstanding the objection. That was my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] the Chair again asked for consent to the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that the bill stand over until to-morrow without losing its place.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Until to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That, of course, is the only operation of the request.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understand the Senator from Tennessee wants the bill postponed until the committee can consider it.

Mr. HARRIS. If the arrangement I suggested is not satisfactory to the Senator from Virginia we shall have exactly the same scene to-morrow morning we are having now. I do not intend, so far as I can prevent it, that this bill shall be considered here until the committee have had an opportunity of examining the questions to which I have referred.

I am willing to say in addition, however, that I am willing to meet the committee at a special meeting at any day that may be named for the purpose of taking up the matter and considering it. I have no desire to delay the consideration of the bill one moment longer than is absolutely necessary for us to give to the Senate satisfactory information as to the best location for the bridge and the best thing to be done considering the public interests both of the people of the District and the people of Virginia.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Now, Mr. President, I object to the further continuation of the debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1477 notwithstanding the objection.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 13; no quorum voting.

Mr. FRYE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am paired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. SLATER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB]. I do not see him in his seat.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] is necessarily absent from the city, and is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] upon all questions, as I understand.

Mr. COKE. My colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is also absent, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. JONES, of Florida (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. I do not see him here. I withdraw my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote will be withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] who has been called out of the Senate Chamber for a few minutes. In consequence of that I withdraw my vote. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. HAWLEY. My colleague [Mr. PLATT] is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. SLATER].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—26.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Hoar,	Riddleberger,
Cameron of Wis.,	Gibson,	Lapham,	Sawyer,
Coke,	Gorman,	Logan,	Sewell,
Conger,	Hale,	Manderson,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Harrison,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Edmunds,	Hawley,	Morrill,
Farley,	Hill,	Palmer,

NAYS—15.

Bayard,	Camden,	Harris,	Ransom,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Morgan,	Vance,
Brown,	Dolph,	Pendleton,	Voorhees.
Call,	Hampton,	Pike,

ABSENT—35.

Allison,	Garland,	Lamar,	Pugh,
Anthony,	George,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Blair,	Groome,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Ingalls,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Butler,	Jackson,	Maxey,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jonas,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vest,
Cockrell,	Jones of Florida,	Mitchell,	Walker,
Dawes,	Jones of Nevada,	Platt,	Williams.
Fair,	Kenna,	Plumb,

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question, after which the report will be read again for information.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Before the report is read I will now state to the Senator from Tennessee that inasmuch as the Senate has taken up the bill relieved from the five-minute rule, if he desires to make any motion that will carry it over for a few days for him to give consideration to these matters, without prejudice, he can suggest that motion and I shall cheerfully yield; but I want to put the bill in a condition where it can have some hearing without a new reference to the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. In view of the information given to the committee and given to the Senate two or three days ago by the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia I suggested then as I did again this morning, that this bill should hold its place on the Calendar and should not be considered until the Committee on the District of Columbia had an opportunity of investigating the questions in respect to the Aqueduct Bridge. Before I can support this bill I desire and intend to investigate those questions. If the Senator from Virginia will suggest a time to which he is willing to let the bill go over, he will but have conformed to the only wish I have expressed from the beginning. But inasmuch as the Senator evidently has a majority with him, I am not inclined to antagonize the majority further than to express my own view and to vote my own way. I think it would be better, however, for all parties concerned that the consideration of the bill be postponed, say for a given number of days or for a week, and in the mean time let the committee meet and consider these questions deliberately, and come in here, as we probably shall, a unit in respect to the bill.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that the reason I suggested that he make the motion is because I am not sufficiently acquainted with matters here and do not want to make a motion that might prejudice the bill when it is called.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be postponed for one week, unless the District Committee shall ask for its consideration at an earlier day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I shall yield to that cheerfully.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the bill be postponed until one week from to-day.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Without prejudice and retaining its present place on the Calendar, relieved of the five-minute rule.

Mr. HARRIS. The vote just taken relieves it of the five-minute rule, but it still holds its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. My request was that it go over for one week, unless the District Committee shall ask for its consideration at an earlier day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that this bill be postponed for one week, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII, but not subject to the five-minute rule of discussion, unless the District Committee shall ask for its consideration at an earlier day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MOBILE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 4) to provide for the settlement of accounts with the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. BROWN. As a Senator interested in that bill is now absent, and it is a measure that I do not think can properly be discussed under the five-minute rule, though I am in charge of it, I suggest that it go over to the other Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be passed over.

JOHN K. HUMMER.

The bill (S. 1176) granting a pension to John K. Hummer was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. That is reported adversely, and I ask that it may go over. I may want to say something about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

JUDGE-ADVOCATE-GENERAL'S BUREAU.

The bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the Corps of Judge-Advocates of the Army, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill was prepared and reported by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY] who is now absent, and probably it would be better that it should go over, without losing its place on the Calendar, until his return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar under Rule VIII. Is there objection?

Mr. SEWELL. If the Senator from Missouri will withdraw his objection——

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not make any objection.

Mr. SEWELL. All the members of the committee understand the bill thoroughly, and there is no occasion to have it go over that I can see.

Mr. COCKRELL. I only made the suggestion. If the Senator desires to go on, very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read the bill, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments. The first amendment was, in line 5, to strike out "judge-advocates" and insert "Judge-Advocate-General's;" so as to read:

That the Bureau of Military Justice and the Corps of Judge-Advocates of the Army be, and the same are hereby, consolidated, under the title of Judge-Advocate-General's Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 11, after the word "and," to strike out "five" and insert "four;" so as to read:

And four judge-advocates with the rank, pay, and allowances of majors.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert, as section 2, the following:

SEC. 2. Promotions in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department, as provided in the first section of this act, shall be by seniority, up to and including the rank of colonel.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to amend, in line 13 of section 1, after the word "selected," by inserting "by seniority."

Mr. LOGAN. That is in the bill, I think.

Mr. SEWELL. Not in the bill as read. I think we agreed on it in committee and it ought to be there.

Mr. LOGAN. I find it is in the second section, the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment reported will be read for information.

The Secretary again reported the amendment adopted as section 2.

Mr. SEWELL. That would probably cover it, but the other would make it more certain, as this is a reorganization.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SEWELL. I move to insert the words "by seniority" after "selected," in line 13 of section 1.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL. There is a report in this case, which ought to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MAXEY February 26, 1884:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the bills (S. 838, S. 899, and S. 1541) to provide promotion in the Corps of Judge-Advocates, respectfully submits the following report:

The organization of this branch of the service differs from all others of the staff. There is one officer with the rank of brigadier-general and seven with the rank of major, and there is no provision for promotion. The great incentive of promotion is wanting. However long a man may serve and however faithfully, he enters, lives, and dies with the same rank. It seems to the committee that this ought not to be. The Secretary of War was called on, on behalf of the committee, and his views solicited. Under date 25th instant he transmits to the committee a communication, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, January 25, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 23d instant, inviting my attention to Senate bill 899 for promotion in the Corps of Judge-Advocates, and requesting information thereon with recommendations, and in reply thereto to state that the Corps of Judge-Advocates of the Army now consists of seven officers, all having equal rank, that of major.

Existing legislation provides for a reduction of the corps to four officers as its permanent organization, to be reached through casualty. These officers have been in service under their present commissions as judge-advocates for the following terms:

One, twenty-one years and two months.
One, nineteen years and four months.
One, nineteen years and three months.
One, eighteen years and eleven months.
One, eighteen years and six months.
One, eighteen years and two months.
One, ten years and five months.

One of this number is at all times on duty as professor of military law at West Point, a detail which of itself gives the officer the local rank and pay of a lieutenant-colonel; so that so far as the present cost to the Government of the promotion provided by the bill under consideration is concerned it would include only an increase of $500 per annum for five officers, or an aggregate of but $2,500.

The anomalous condition of the corps, the only one in the Army in which there is no promotion, is due to the fact that when the Army was reorganized, in 1866, while all other corps were given an organization with different grades of rank, a certain number of judge-advocates were retained in service with a restriction that their service should be terminable at the will of the Secretary of War. This restriction was removed by the act of February 25, 1867.

It is believed that the absence of all hope of advancement for officers of this corps, while they see officers who have been their juniors in rank promoted to be their seniors, is an injustice that should be remedied, and that in view of the fact that, with the exception of one of them, who will soon be retired, they are so nearly of an age, the principle of promotion contained in the bill for longevity of service would be the most advisable and fairest remedy. It is to be borne in mind that the duties of these officers are of a character to station them at headquarters of military departments, where the question of rank becomes of moment, and also that with increased years there has come to them increased demands of expenditure without the increased income which service in any other corps would have given.

In view of the foregoing I earnestly recommend the passage of Senate bill No. 899.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. S. B. MAXEY,
Of Committee on Military Affairs, United States Senate.

These views of the Secretary of War are deemed by the committee eminently just to this very important and useful corps of officers and promotive of the best interests of the service. The committee, however, believes that the Corps of Judge-Advocates should be organized with graduated rank similar to other corps. Wherefore the committee reports back S. 899 and S. 1541, and recommends that they be indefinitely postponed, and reports back S. 838 amended as shown by the bill submitted with this report, and as amended recommends that said bill 838 do pass.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

J. D. MORRISON.

The bill (S. 895) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment of $408.10 to J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison, of Rockbridge County, Virginia, being the excess of taxes improperly and unlawfully collected of them for whisky distilled by them in January, 1866.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. M'CLINTOCK.

The bill (S. 919) for the relief of John M. McClintock was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to reopen and reconsider the claim of John M. McClintock for the refunding of certain taxes alleged to have been improperly and illegally assessed and collected to the amount of $3,600; and if upon reopening and reconsidering the claim the Commissioner shall find these taxes, or any part of the same, to have been illegally or improperly assessed and collected from the claimant, it is made his duty to audit and ascertain the amount of taxes so illegally and improperly collected from the claimant, deducting, however, any legal unpaid taxes which the claimant should have paid and did not pay, if any there shall be, under section 103 of the act of June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'NAMARA.

The bill (S. 1352) for the relief of William McNamara was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was reported adversely by me, and at the instance of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] it was placed on the Calendar. I therefore object to its consideration, but will not move its indefinite postponement, because he is absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

JOHN H. WALKER.

The bill (S. 83) for the relief of John H. Walker, late a captain in the United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 3, after the words "that the Secretary of War be directed to," to strike out the words:

Reimburse Capt. John H. Walker, Fourteenth United States Infantry, the value of certain personal property destroyed by fire in his quarters at Camp C. F. Smith, in the Indian country, Arizona, in February, 1869. That the amount paid shall not exceed the sum of $1,500, which shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Ascertain and determine the value of the personal property lost by Capt. J. H. Walker, of the Fourteenth United States Infantry, destroyed by fire in his quarters at Camp C. F. Smith, in the Indian country, in Oregon, in February, 1869, without fault or neglect on his part; and the amount so ascertained shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That no allowance be made for any property destroyed except what was useful for such an officer while in quarters, engaged in the public service, in the line of duty, and not exceeding in amount the sum of $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ROBERT J. BAUGNESS.

The bill (S. 445) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Robert J. Baugness was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of War to correct the record of Robert J. Baugness, late a private in Company I, Thirty-seventh Illinois Volunteers, so as to remove the charge of desertion, and the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pay to the heirs or legal representative of Baugness the bounty and allowances that would have been due him had not such charge of desertion appeared against him on the rolls.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAURA PRINE.

The bill (S. 986) granting a pension to Laura Prine was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. That bill is reported adversely, and I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

IOWA INDIAN TRIBE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Iowa Indian reservation, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, for the issuance of a patent for a reservation for the Iowa tribe of Indians in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to ask whether the Secretary is reading Senate bill 1108?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He is reading Senate bill 1108, Order of Business 286.

Mr. MANDERSON. I notice by the report of the committee that they recommend the indefinite postponement of Senate bill 1108 and recommend the adoption of a substitute therefor. I think it quite evident that there is a misprint in the Calendar. Senate bill 1108 is not the one recommended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report on file is a report of the bill with amendments. The original text of the bill is now being read.

Mr. MANDERSON. Of the bill as recommended by the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of the bill as reported from the committee, and the amendments of the committee have not yet been reached. On the 26th of February the bill was reported with an amendment, which is to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert a long amendment, which is printed at the end of the original bill. If there be no objection, the reading of the original bill will be dispensed with, and the Secretary will read the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think that is the better course.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment of the committee, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That with the consent of the Iowa tribe of Indians, expressed in open council, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized to cause to be surveyed, if necessary, and sold, the remainder of the reservation of the Iowa Indians, lying in the States of Nebraska and Kansas. The said lands shall be appraised in tracts of forty acres each, by three competent commissioners, one of whom shall be selected by the Iowa tribe of Indians and the other two shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That after the survey and appraisement of said lands the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized to offer the same through the United States public-land office at Beatrice, Nebr., at public sale to the highest bidder. In cases where improvements have been made by any Indian or for the United States upon such lands, such improvements shall be separately appraised: Provided, That no portion of such land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case for less than $2.50 per acre, and to none except such as purchase the same for actual occupation and settlement, and who have made and subscribed on oath before the register of said land office and filed the same with said officer of the land office at Beatrice, Nebr., that it is his good-faith intention to settle upon and occupy the land which he seeks to purchase and improve the same for a home; and, except in case of the death of the purchaser, unless said party shall have executed his declared intention by making improvements and being in actual occupation of said land by actual residence thereon at the time for making the second payment, he shall forfeit the payment already made, and the land shall be subject to resale as hereinafter provided. Each purchaser of said lands at such sale shall be entitled to purchase one hundred and sixty acres of land and no more, except in cases where a tract contains a fractional excess over one hundred and sixty acres. If the excess is less than forty acres, is contiguous, and results from inability in the survey to make township and section lines conform to the boundary lines of the reservation, and no other objection exists, the purchase of such excess shall be allowed. Such purchaser shall pay one-fourth of the purchase price at the time said land is bid off, one-fourth in one year, one-fourth in two years, and one-fourth in three years, with interest on the deferred payments at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum; and where there are improvements upon the lands purchased, which shall have been separately appraised, the purchaser shall pay the appraised value of such improvements at the time of purchase in addition to the amounts hereinbefore required to be paid. No patents shall issue until all payments shall have been made; and on the failure of any purchaser to make payment as required, he shall forfeit the land purchased, and the same shall be subject to entry and sale at the appraised value thereof, or shall be again offered at public sale, as the Secretary of the Interior may determine.

SEC. 3. That if any member of said Iowa tribe of Indians residing at the date of the passage of this act upon any of the lands authorized to be sold by the second section of this act, and who has made valuable improvements thereon, shall elect to remain on the lands occupied by him, such lands shall be withheld from sale; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a patent to issue to the person so electing for one hundred and sixty acres of land, to include his said improvements, which patent shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented, for the period of twenty-five years, in trust, for the sole use and benefit of the patentee, or in the case of his decease, of his heirs according to the laws of the State in which said land is situated, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Indian, or his heirs, as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust, and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever; and if any conveyance shall be made of the lands thus patented, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such conveyance or contract shall be absolutely null and void.

SEC. 4. That the proceeds of the sale of any improvements belonging to individual Indians shall be paid to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in trust, to be expended for the benefit of the Indians to whom such improvements belonged. The proceeds of the sale of any improvements belonging to the United States shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States; and the proceeds of the sale of said lands, first deducting therefrom the cost of the survey, appraisement, and sale, and the expense of removing the Indians to the Indian Territory, as hereinafter provided, shall be placed to the credit of said Iowa Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and shall bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, which income shall be annually expended for the benefit of said Indians, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 5. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause a patent to be issued to the Iowa tribe of Indians for the following-described lands in the Indian Territory, namely: Commencing at the point where the Deep Fork of the Canadian River intersects the west boundary of the Sac and Fox reservation; thence north along said west boundary to the south bank of the Cimarron River; thence up said Cimarron River to the Indian meridian; thence south along said Indian meridian to the Deep Fork of the Canadian River; thence down said Deep Fork to the place of beginning; which lands were set apart for the permanent use and occupation of the Iowa and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior might see fit to locate thereon, by an executive order dated August 15, 1883.

SEC. 6. That the patent authorized by the preceding section to be issued to said Iowa tribe of Indians shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus patented for the period of twenty-five years in trust for the sole use and benefit of said Iowa tribe and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to locate with them, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to said Iowa tribe of Indians in fee discharged of said trust and free of all charges and incumbrances whatsoever.

SEC. 7. That whenever the Indians who may be properly residing upon said Iowa reservation shall desire allotments of lands in severalty, the Secretary of the Interior shall cause allotments to be made to such Indians in quantity as follows:

To each head of a family, 160 acres.

To each single person over the age of 21 years, 80 acres.

SEC. 8. That upon the approval of the allotments provided for in the preceding section by the Secretary of the Interior, the President shall cause patents to issue therefor in the name of the allottees, which patents shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States does and will hold the land thus allotted, for the period of twenty-five years, in trust, for the sole use and benefit of the Indian to whom such allotment shall have been made, or in case of his decease, of his heirs, and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same by patent to the said Indian, or his heirs, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever; and if any conveyance shall be made of the lands set apart and allotted as herein provided, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such conveyance or contract shall be absolutely null and void: Provided, That the foregoing conditions, restrictions, and limitations shall not extend beyond the expiration of the time expressed in the patent herein authorized to be issued to the tribe in common: And provided further, That these patents when issued shall override the patent authorized to be issued to the tribe as aforesaid, and shall separate the individual allotment from the lands held in common, which proviso shall be incorporated in the tribal patent.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of the Interior may, with the consent of the Indians, expressed in open council, cause the removal of that portion of the Iowa tribe residing upon said Iowa reservation in Nebraska and Kansas to the Iowa reservation in the Indian Territory, and expend such sum as may be rendered necessary by such removal, and for the comfort and advancement in civilization of said Indians, and of the Iowas already residing in the Indian Territory; and the sum of $30,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of such expenses and for the expenses of the survey, appraisement, and sale of said Iowa lands; and the amount so expended shall be reimbursed to the United States out of the first proceeds of the sales of said lands.

Mr. GORMAN. I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee, in section 2, line 10, by striking out "two dollars and fifty cents" and inserting "ten dollars;" so as to provide that these lands shall not be sold for less than $10 an acre.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COCKRELL in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GORMAN. This reservation is now surrounded by settlers and is exceedingly valuable. As I understand, the land is worth from ten to twenty dollars an acre. The limit provided by the committee's amendment is that it shall not be sold for less than $2.50 per acre. My amendment will provide that the sale shall not be for less than $10 per acre.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I would suggest to the Senator from Maryland that the danger of his proposition is that while some of this land is undoubtedly worth $10 an acre some of it is worth probably much less than $10 an acre, and I see no reason for making a departure from the rule established in all cases of this kind that the land shall be appraised, and that in no instance shall it be sold at less than $2.50 per acre. Why does the Senator desire at this time and in this bill to change the policy of legislation on this matter and insert $10 an acre, when it never has been asked for before? Undoubtedly some of the land will be appraised at more than $10 an acre and some at less, because it will really not be worth $10 per acre. It must sell for at least the appraised value, but not less than $2.50 an acre.

Mr. DAWES. I think that two dollars and a half is less than the land will be appraised at; but whether $10 is too much I am not quite able to say. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] who is now absent had charge of this bill, and in committee the amount was discussed. I think it would have met the judgment of the Senator from Kansas to have the limit considerably higher than it is. We put in $2.50 per acre, which is according to the old rule. But land in Kansas is worth a great deal more now than it was when this rule was established. I think it ought to be raised; I am not quite prepared to say it ought to go up to $10 an acre. I think, perhaps, if the Senator would make his amendment $8 or $5 it would be better. The land has to go at the appraisal, and the appraisal may be above $5, notwithstanding $5 is fixed; but if it should be put at $10, and some portion of it should be poor land it might embarrass very much, if not prevent the sale altogether. I think under a faithful execution of the law it would make no difference whether $2.50 or $10 was named; the only benefit of having it at $10 rather than $2.50 is to strengthen the moral tone of the appraisers. I agree that there is some necessity for that, but whether that is not an overstraining of the matter remains to be considered.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope the Senator from Maryland will modify his amendment so as to make the least amount at which this land can be sold $5 an acre instead of ten. There are 16,000 acres of land in this reservation. Of that 16,000 acres, 10,800 acres are in the State of Nebraska and 5,200 acres in the State of Kansas. I know enough of that country to know that it is impossible to find a body of land of that extent that is uniformly worth as much as $10 an acre. I think, perhaps, all of it might be worth at least $5 an acre; and if the Senator will modify his amendment so as to make the price five instead of ten dollars I do not think it would meet with any opposition from any one interested in that section of the country.

As suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, the difficulty is that if the amount is fixed at $10 much of this land may be left unsold. That certainly would be objectionable in the interest of the Land Department and in the interest of the Indians to whom this money is to go. I hope the amendment will be so modified.

Mr. GORMAN. I believe the minimum fixed by this bill will be all that the Government will receive when this land is sold. While I have no personal knowledge of this reservation, the information which I have derived from various quarters since the committee has considered this bill, and in part from the Senators representing the States in which the land is located, leads me to believe that the greater portion of the reservation at a fair sale would bring exceeding $10 an acre, and the estimate has been placed as high as $25 an acre. It is exceedingly valuable.

I have no other object than to protect the Government, This bill provides for the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory and gives them a tract of land at the end of twenty-five years, which simply means that if any of these Indians are alive at the expiration of twenty-five years they will have disposed of all their lands and will be paupers on the hands of the Government. I propose that from the sale of their present reservation we shall realize something to provide for them hereafter. I prefer to have the vote of the Senate on my proposition of $10 an acre, which I do not conceive to be excessive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 3967. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill.

Mr. DAWES. I hope that will be laid aside until the Indian bill can be disposed of. I hope the Senator from Kansas will allow us a few minutes to dispose of this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. If it can be disposed of without debate, I have no objection; but if it is to lead to debate which will take up any considerable period of time, I shall not consent.

Mr. DAWES. Of course I can not tell. There is only the proposition of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] that the price shall be $10 an acre to be voted on. That will be the only proposition likely to lead to debate, I think. I ask unanimous consent that the pending order may be laid aside temporarily, and we shall see whether we can finish the bill.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall have to object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Alabama.

COAL LANDS IN WHITE MOUNTAIN RESERVATION.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask consent of the Senate, as I shall probably be absent to-morrow, that Order of Business 289 may be informally passed over without perjudice when it shall be reached on the Calendar to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland asks unanimous consent that Order of Business 289 Senate bill No. 1651, to authorize the leasing of coal lands on the White Mountain Indian reservation, in the Territory of Arizona, shall not be acted upon when called in his absence and that it retain its place on the Calendar under the eighth rule. Is there objection?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I think that bill may as well be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I move that the bill referred to by the Senator from Maryland be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that the bill just referred to be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 1724) for the relief of Santiago de Leon was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (H. R. 555) granting a pension to John Galloup;

A bill (H. R. 709) granting a pension to Robert L. Willey;

A bill (H. R. 1164) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Elenor Stough;

A bill (H. R. 1631) to increase the pension of Mathew O. Regan;

A bill (H. R. 2070) granting a pension to Decatur Hamlin;

A bill (H. R. 2677) granting a pension to Miss Mary P. MacBlair;

A bill (H. R. 2908) granting a pension to James McManus;

A bill (H. R. 3466) granting a pension to Azzur W. Reader;

A bill (H. R. 3656) granting a pension to Salome Ann Walker;

A bill (H. R. 4041) granting a pension to Zelica T. Dunlap;

A bill (H. R. 5213) to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 5215) granting a pension to Orlando Culver; and

A bill (H. R. 5686) granting a pension to Sarah J. Chipman.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 578) to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society of Kansas;

A bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 239) to fill vacancies existing in the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker;

A bill (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla; and

Joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope this bill will be recommitted. If it is the intention of the Senate to acquire information in respect of the two diseases referred to in the bill, I hope that they will be content to put in operation the present ample machinery of the Government for the purpose of obtaining such information, and not resort to an extension of the bureaucratic system that it seems to me is covering the country all over with agencies of the General Government, instead of the natural means of relief, local knowledge, local self-government, local self-interest, to attend to local affairs.

But besides that tendency, which I think is most alarming in its progress, I do not see how it can well be denied that the present bill, framed as it is, contains in many sections direct invasions of power admittedly belonging to the States and entirely outside of Federal cognizance, that have been pointed out with ability and perspicuity by the honorable Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] and by others who have considered this bill; and I hope the committee from whom the bill was reported may now take it and at least eviscerate from it these obviously unwarranted features.

If the General Government is to pass into this enormous system of medication of diseased cattle everywhere, if it is to assume the whole ground and field of power of quarantine for such diseases, if the Treasury of the country is to be opened to unlimited drafts for the amount in payment for these things, let it at least have the semblance of control by distinct provisions of the charter under which we assume to act. The bill is so open to criticism that it is scarcely worth while for me to add my own to those already more ably given.

I have only risen to say that I hope there will be no objection on the part of friends of the measure or its general object to allowing it to be recommitted, in order that if it does appear again in the Senate it may at least come in less objectionable shape.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] to recommit the bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 10; no quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BECK. Let us have the yeas and nays. Their call will develop whether there is a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asks for the yeas and nays on the motion to recommit.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMDEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay" on this motion.

Mr. KENNA (when his name was called). I am pnired on all questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. I do not know how he would vote. If he were here, I should vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. COLQUITT (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. COKE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. MAXEY] is absent from the city, and is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. SABIN] is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I am not aware how the Senator from Delaware would vote. My colleague would vote "nay" if present. The Senator from Delaware, I am informed, would vote "yea."

Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin. I am requested to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. The Senator from New Jersey, if present, would vote in favor of recommitting the bill and the Senator from Nevada against it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I paired some few moments ago with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who was called out, but I voted because I believed he would vote "nay."

Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin. He would.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I will leave my vote stand.

Mr. GORMAN. On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Bayard,	Farley,	Morgan,	Vance.
Beck,	Gibson,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Hampton,	Pugh,
Coke,	Harris,	Ransom,

NAYS—30.

Aldrich,	Frye,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Call,	George,	Manderson,	Sewell,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I inquire if there is an amendment pending? If not, I have an amendment to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). There is an amendment pending to section 10, to strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred."

Mr. PLUMB. I ask the Senate to vote down that amendment. I believe I have no authority to withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the amendment will be considered disagreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] now moves an amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed at the end of section 6 to insert:

Provided, That the so-called splenetic or Texas fever shall not be considered a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease within the meaning of sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of this act, as to cattle being transported by rail to market for slaughter when the same are unloaded only to be fed and watered in lots on the way thereto.

Mr. COKE: I desire to make a very brief explanation of this amendment.

Section 6 is the principle one named in the proviso. The object is to take away the power from any authority to declare quarantine against Texas cattle being transported to market for slaughter by rail. All the testimony that has been adduced here is conclusive that it is absolutely safe to transport Texas cattle by rail in the way proposed by the amendment. Thirty per cent. of the $207,000,000 worth of cattle handled in the Chicago market last year was Texas cattle, carried there during the months of the year when the Treasury Cattle Commission would advise that they be quarantined, and the testimony from the Chicago stock-yards is that there was no case of sickness from the Texas fever at all.

I have read these certificates sufficiently often for the Senate to be well informed with reference to them. I will call attention to another fact, and that is that no legislative body, no body of stock-raisers or stock-breeders, no association of any sort, many of which bodies have sent memorials here on the subject of pleuro-pneumonia, has in one single instance asked for legislation against Texas fever. In addition to that, I call attention to resolutions of the great convention of stock-breeders in the West, including the Wyoming Cattle Association, in which this resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That, in answer to a suggestion of injury to the Texas interests, the members of this association are the largest customers for Texas cattle in the West and hope and expect to remain so; that 150,000 head of Texas cattle have been bought by the members of this association for delivery the coming summer, and that it knows of no cattle disease in any part of Texas which could justify the application of quarantine measures in that State.

Not only is the negative true, that nobody has ever called upon Congress for legislation on this subject, but here is an affirmative resolution from a great body of stock people in the West declaring that there is no disease in Texas that could justify quarantine as to the cattle from Texas.

I call the attention of the Senate again to the fact that the cattle of the United States are estimated somewhere between 42,000,000 and 45,000,000 head. In 1883 the comptroller's books of the State of Texas showed that taxes were assessed on 6,040,000 head in that State. The usual rate of increase in that State is 33⅓ per cent. per annum. If you put it down to 25 per cent., or to 20 per cent., you will see that the cattle of that State amount now to upward of 7,000,000 head, about one-sixth of the cattle of the United States. At $20 a head the interest of that State is worth $150,000,000. This interest is too great to be put within the discretion of anybody, or to be quarantined, to be shut out from the market to the detriment of the consumers of this country when no one has been heard calling upon Congress for legislation for protection against any disease that those cattle may have.

My amendment simply provides that these cattle may be transported by rail, that they may not be taken off the railroad except to be fed and watered in lots by the side of the railway on their way to the market where they are to be slaughtered.

It is well known by those who are posted as to the so-called Texas fever that you may put Northern cattle and Texas cattle in the same car and transport them a thousand miles and no disease is communicated. You may put them in the same lot, and no disease is communicated by one to the other. The only circumstances under which the disease is communicated are where the Northern or unacclimated cattle graze on a pasture that has been fed on by Texas cattle, but the Northern cow that receives the disease under those conditions is incapable of transmitting it to any other. You may take a Northern cow that has the Texas fever and put her in a lot with a thousand other Northern cows that have not been subjected to the same conditions and they will not take it from her. The disease dies out with the first transmission, it is not capable of being transmitted second-hand, and the first white frost that comes destroys all germs of it.

When the nature of this disease is understood it is plainly seen that there can be no danger in ingrafting this amendment upon the bill, because the cattle are to be transported by rail and fed and watered in lots by themselves on the railroad on their way to market where they are to be slaughtered. I will read again, because there may be some gentleman here now who did not hear it a few days ago, an affidavit and letter——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question, so that I may understand the application of his argument? Do I understand the Senator as proposing the second proviso in the amendment be had printed?

Mr. COKE. No, sir; I do not offer that. Here is the letter to which I refer, and I ask the attention of Senators to it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 21, 1884.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries concerning the sickness among cattle, commonly called "Texas fever," as to how it is regarded at the Union Stock-Yards, Chicago, Ill., we will state the following as facts coming under our personal observation:

The number of Texas cattle received at the stock-yards, Chicago, per year, will run from 300,000 to 350,000 head.

The sickness called "Texas fever" is not regarded with any special apprehension by the trade generally, as for a number of years past it appears to be diminishing.

The trade at the above-named yards in stock and feeding cattle and milch cows is very large, amounting to $500,000 to $1,000,000 per month. This trade is continuous, lasting the year round, there being no business day in which buyers are not operating, and during the warm months, when Texas cattle mostly arrive, buyers take store cattle and milch cows the same as if there were no Texas cattle in the yards. Cow dealers and store-cattle dealers take hay which has laid before Texas cattle to feed their own stock. These dealers often yard their own cattle in pens in which Texas cattle have stood to avail themselves of the feed left uneaten by the Texas cattle. In short, Texas cattle have worked themselves out from their former reputation as being highly dangerous to bring in contact with our native cattle. Authenticated cases of "Texas fever" of late years are scarce, and the percentage of mortality arising therefrom is so small compared with the aggregate transactions that dealers pay but little attention thereto.

This letter is signed by B. F. Harrison and F. D. Bartlett, and there are gentlemen in the Senate who know them. I desire also to call attention to the following affidavit:

Robert Strahorn, H. H. Conover, Lewis R. Hastings, and Reuben P. Conger, being first duly sworn, upon their oaths state:

That they are now engaged in buying and selling cattle at the Union Stock-Yards of Chicago, and have been so engaged for at least twenty years past; that the annual receipts of Texas cattle at said stock-yards amount to from 300,000 to 350,000 head, and that the disease known as "Texas fever" is not now regarded at said stock-yards with any apprehension, and has not been so regarded for years, and that any fears that may have been entertained in the past at said stock-yards on that score have been dispelled by reason of almost total immunity from said disease at that point.

And it must be remembered that this trade has been going on all the time with perfect freedom, without any restriction whatever.

That the average number of cattle received and sold at the said stock-yards weekly is about 36,000 head, and that sellers, buyers, and owners of the same—in short, every one handling cattle there—have no hesitation in yarding calves, milch cows, stockers, feeders, fat cattle, or any other cattle in the pens that have just been occupied by Texas cattle, and allowing them to drink water from the same troughs, and to eat the hay left by the Texas cattle; and that, in short, the authentic cases of "Texas fever" at said stock-yards have been so small in comparison with the aggregate transactions in Texas cattle that the disease has come to be regarded there as an exploded theory.

R. STRAHORN,
H. H. CONOVER,
L. R. HASTINGS,
R. P. CONGER.

I submit the amendment to the Senate upon these reasons.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I hope the friends of the bill will allow this amendment to be adopted. The provision which it contains seems to be entirely innocuous so far as the cattle of the West are concerned, and it seems, for the reasons stated by the Senator from Texas, to be a very necessary provision for the protection of the cattle-growers of his State.

I shall vote for the bill if this amendment is adopted, however, with some reluctance, mainly upon assurances from Senators representing Western States in which the cattle interest is very large that a measure of this sort is necessary to protect the property of their people.

I hope, sir, that the amendment of the Senator from Texas will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. In section 3, line 20, after the word "investigations," I move to strike out that portion of the text which remains as yet in the bill, which reads as follows:

In paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

If the Senate votes to strike out those words, I shall then move to insert in line 20, after the word "in," the words "making and reporting;" so as to read:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in making and reporting such investigations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I move that amendment because I believe it is necessary in order to make this a constitutional measure of legislation. Suppose we were to admit that because a man has a sick horse, a sick cow, a sick dog, or any other sick species of property, therefore it is the duty of the Government of the United States to prevent some other man's horse, or cow, or dog from getting sick, and that we should kill it and pay for it at its value. Suppose we should admit it to be a correct principle of legislation and public policy that because a man's property gets sick and may endanger the life or health of some other man's property, therefore we shall kill that property and slaughter it and pay for it at full value or at any value, still I can not reconcile it to myself to vote for a measure that authorizes the Commissioner of Agriculture, in concurrence with the State authorities or without such concurrence, to pass upon the question of the slaughtering of the animal, its condemnation to death, and the compensation to be paid for the animal, without any notice being given to the owner, or without any sort of legal process for determining the fact whether the animal ought to be slaughtered to attain the purpose in question, or what the price should be at which the animal is to be paid for. The bill leaves all these matters entirely indefinite. According to this provision in section 2—

Whenever the plans and methods of the Commissioner of Agriculture shall be accepted by any State or Territory in which pleuro-pneumonia or other contagious, infectious, or communicable disease is declared to exist, or such State or Territory shall have adopted plans and methods for the suppression and extirpation of said diseases, and such plans and methods shall be accepted by the Commissioner of Agriculture, and whenever the governor of a State or other properly constituted authorities signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in conformity with the provisions of this act, the Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations in paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

This is rather a jumble of language, and ideas too, and it is a very considerable jumble in respect of our political system in this country, for here we give to the Territorial Legislatures, which we have a perfect right to control by our legislation, as much power to determine when animals shall be slaughtered and paid for and upon what conditions and how much shall be paid for them, as we give to State Legislatures. That is a confused way of presenting a very important question. I should not like to pass an act of Congress, and yet I know we have the right to do it, to authorize the Territorial Legislatures of the different Territories to take a man's personal estate and condemn it for any purpose to be destroyed absolutely because that Legislature might think it was for the public benefit that we should authorize it to be done.

But the rights that we have in reference to the States and in reference to the Territories are totally dissimilar. When a State has advanced to the political condition of being a sovereign in the American Union we have nothing further to do with her local legislation, we have nothing further to do with her police laws or whatever may be necessary to protect the health of animals or men, except only that when the State finds itself unequal to the task of doing these things we may vote money for the purpose of assisting the State. But here we have States and Territories put in the same category; we exercise over them the same power, and of course we concede to them the same constitutional authority under our system of laws.

We then proceed and we say that if a Territorial Legislature, or the properly constituted authorities in a Territory, signify their readiness to co-operate for the extinction of any contagious or infectious disease, and they shall co-operate with the Commissioner of Agriculture, thereupon a state of law takes place operating within that State or within that Territory, enacted not by Congress, enacted not by the States, certainly not enacted by the two tribunals in co-operation, for they can not co-operate in such matters, but enacted by the ipse dixit of the State or Territorial authorities on the one hand and the Commissioner of Agriculture on the other—most important enactments, enactments of a very stringent character, enactments that approximate in their spirit and effect the declaration of martial law, a law by which a man's property can be seized and condemned out of hand without anything else being done or said about it than merely the co-operation of the Commissioner of Agriculture with the State or Territorial authorities decreeing that it shall be so condemned.

After we have enacted this bill we shall no longer, I suppose, flatter ourselves with the boast that this is a land of law. We may say it is a land of law except in those instances where Senators have devised schemes by which they have transferred the law-making power from their own hands into the hands of the Commissioner of Agriculture, and he, co-operating with the Territorial or State Legislatures, enacts or decrees what shall be the law.

Suppose we find a case where a man's herds are affected with pleuro-pneumonia. He has a herd, we will say, of a thousand head of cattle and fifty animals of that herd are affected with pleuro-pneumonia. Whose fault is it? It can not be the fault of the Government, either local or general, that the disease has attacked the man's herd. Whose fault is it if the yellow-fever attacks a man's family and destroys his household? Whose fault is it if the father and mother of a little child are swept away by some epidemic disease? It is not the fault of legislation, either local or general, and I have yet to understand that it is any part of the duty of a government to relieve a man from losses because of the misfortunes which attend human life or animal life. I have yet to learn that it is any part of the duty of any government whatsoever to pay a man for his herds because they may become diseased. I say, suppose that fifty head out of a herd of a thousand are attacked with pleuro-pneumonia; thereupon the Commissioner of Agriculture and the State or Territorial authorities co-operating come together, and they say it is necessary in order to protect the remainder of this man's herd and to protect the community at large that those fifty head of valuable cattle shall be destroyed. As a matter of course it may be necessary to do it; but where should the loss fall? Will the Government set itself up as possessing the duty, or the power either, to draw from the public Treasury to compensate that man because disease has attacked his cattle and it is necessary to kill them in order to stop the disease? Surely, sir, this is the very romance of extravagance and of folly in legislation. The absurdity of it has never before been paralleled in the history of legislation. When you say that because a man's herd is attacked with disease and it becomes necessary for the protection of the remainder of his own property that he should destroy them, therefore it must result that the Government of the United States from its Treasury must pay the man for what he loses in consequence of this visitation of Providence.

I will take, if you please, the ravages of the cotton insect in the Southern States, which in the last ten years have decreased the product of the cotton crop not less than $100,000,000 in value, doubtless very far beyond that. This plague visits a cotton plantation; it gets into the center of it. Unquestionably by destroying the crop, by pulling it up and putting it upon the fire, you can stop the spread of the plague in that locality; but it takes to itself the wings of the wind and it flies from plantation to plantation until the whole country is involved in it. In regard to one of the most valuable of our export crops and of our crops of home consumption, a matter that concerns the farmer and the planter, a visitation of Providence, may be checked, may be extirpated, may be stamped out if you will spend money enough and take pains enough and employ labor enough to accomplish the job. Suppose I should bring in here a bill providing that whenever a cotton farm is attacked with the caterpillar, thereupon it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture, in co-operation with the constituted authorities of Alabama, to stamp out the visitation upon that crop, and that they shall assess the value of the cotton that is to be destroyed in order to make the stamping out a successful process. I should be laughed out of the Senate if I should bring in a proposition so absurd as that; but it seems that other Senators can do so, representing vast interests in the Northwest, and they are not only not laughed out of the Senate, but they are encouraged to believe that it is a constitutional and a just system of legislation.

Mr. BAYARD. Why not compensate for droughts?

Mr. MORGAN. Of course; why not compensate for droughts? Why not compensate the people of Michigan, when the fires break loose in their forests and burn up vast domains of beautiful, splendid timber? Why not address yourself, as it seems to be the duty or the conceived opinion of duty on the part of Senators, to the remedy of compensating for all human calamity out of the Treasury of the United States?

Sir, we are going to make a laughing-stock of ourselves if we keep on in this course of legislation. Take the caterpillar that infests some of the harvest fields of the Northern States and eats up the grass, the wheat crops, the rye, the oats, &c. Is Congress to send the Commissioner of Agriculture out with his means of extirpation to protect the crop and to pay for all the farmer loses in the mean time, or to pay for all which it may be necessary to destroy in order to circumvallate the march of the army-worms and prevent them from proceeding to destroy the crops of the country? We have no right to do that. To come down to the plain, common-sense, square fact, it is an abuse of the powers that the people of the United States have conferred upon us here.

More than that, I am not willing to allow a bill to go out of the Senate by my vote which confers the absolute power of discretionary legislation upon anybody else. We are sent here to legislate for this country in connection with the House of Representatives, and not to delegate powers to the Commissioner of Agriculture in co-operation with State or Territorial authorities or any other set of men for the purpose of enacting laws in this country. When you come to execute this proposed law upon a herd of cattle and condemn them to slaughter and then to pay for them, you can not find written upon any statute-book the authority to do it and the conditions upon which it shall be done or the nature of the judicial or due processes which shall be exercised in the execution of this very important and very delicate power. You propose to leave all that in the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture in connection with the powers of State or Territorial authority with whom he may co-operate.

That is not legislation in the sense of the American Constitution. A law enacted in accordance with the American Constitution must be read as to its whole import and as to its whole legal effect from the face of the statute-book itself. A law which is to be interpreted not by what is spoken on the face of the statute but by something that is to be done outside, aliunde, something that is to be done hereafter by some person else, resting in the discretion of that person, is not a law within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and when we enact it we put upon the statute-book a void authority, and it would be held void if it was tested in any court in the world. If the Commissioner of Agriculture in connection with the State authorities should proceed under this act of Congress to condemn the property of any man whatsoever, they would make themselves liable in an action of trespass for the value of the property, if he chose to bring suit against them. Why so? Not perhaps for the want of authority in the enacting bodies, but because the Congress of the United States, if it passes the bill in the form in which it is presented here now, would have left the matter in such an indefinite shape as that no man could say that that was a law which would protect an officer in its execution, for we can not give to an officer in this country power to protect himself against trespass merely by saying to him, "you shall have legal authority to proceed to take any man's property that you please, and upon your own discretion and judgment condemn it to slaughter or to destruction."

If we were to name the Commissioner of Agriculture, Hon. George B. Loring, in a bill, and say that the Congress of the United States hereby confers upon Hon. George B. Loring, Commissioner of Agriculture, within the District of Columbia, where we have supreme power of legislation, authority to take the personal property of A or B at his will and discretion, upon his own private judgment, and condemn that property to slaughter and to draw upon the Treasury of the United States to pay for it such a sum of money as he might think it was worth, that act of Congress would not protect the Commissioner of Agriculture against a suit in trespass in the courts of the District of Columbia. I must think that there is not a lawyer in the sound of my voice to-day who does not appreciate the value of that proposition, and who must not see that the manner in which the committee have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate of the United States is not the manner or the method required by the Constitution of our country.

I therefore think that that much of this bill ought to go out, and if we intend to condemn cattle to slaughter, we ought to express the conditions upon which they are to be condemned, the nature of the inquiry which is to precede the condemnation, and then, if we are to pay for them as condemned and slaughtered cattle, we ought to say something about the value or the price at which they are to be paid for and the manner of ascertaining that value or that price. But the bill is a mere roving commission, giving to the Commissioner of Agriculture the power to slaughter cattle where he pleases, and pay for them at such prices as may suit his own judgment.

There is a good deal more in this bill. One feature in it I desire to allude to now. I do not consider this a fair bill at all; I consider it a very unjust bill. While I give to the Senators who are trying to put the bill upon the statute-book full credit for patriotic motives and sentiments and for an earnest purpose only to do good and not to do harm, yet they put it within the power of the cattle-dealers of the Northwestern States to destroy the cattle trade of the South. In one view of the case perhaps I ought not to object to it. I find that the enormous herds of cattle that are raised in Texas, and a good many raised along the Gulf coast and the South Atlantic, find their way to market through the green pasture fields of the interior of this country, the fields in which they are fattened and prepared for market by railway chiefly after they get in reach of the great railway systems of the country. All are transported to Chicago or else to the Northeast, it makes no difference whether they are intended for the local or whether they are intended for the foreign market. All of our products take that route.

We send very little cotton, or rice, or sugar, or tobacco, or any other Southern product except our lumber (and not very much of that either) by way of the sea around to New York out of our own ports. Almost everything is drawn into the great railway system of the country, and is swept into this tide of commercial migration from the Southwest to the Northeast. I will suppose a case. I will suppose that the great herdsmen of Wyoming, of Idaho, and of Dakota, of the general Northwest, who are occupying free of charge the vast public domain, upon which they are growing rich and fat, should desire to monopolize the market of Chicago, or the market of Buffalo, or the market of New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, or the market abroad: they can by an arrangement between the Commissioner of Agriculture and some of the States and Territories put a barrier against the exportation of cattle from the Southern States toward those Northern markets in the season of the year to which the Senator from Texas has so often alluded when alone the cattle upon the Southern plains are fit for human food, and when alone they can be transported conveniently or profitably to market. This combination is entered into with a view of putting up the price of cattle in the Northern and Northeastern markets by creating a scarcity at a particular season of the year. Supposing those men have such intentions and supposing that their interests lead them in that way, what power do we not put into their hands to get the control of the Northern markets and to raise the price of meat to any figure that they please? Senators who feel that they are flattering the industrial people of this land, the farmers, &c., had better be aware that they are flattering rather a shrewd set of men, who not only look through the thin glass of their pretenses and pretensions but bore and penetrate deep into these questions and will have an understanding about them. Here we are lodging the power in the hands of a Territorial government——

Mr. BECK. If the Senator at this point will allow me to make a suggestion in the line in which he is now speaking it may save me from making a speech hereafter. The great mass of the herds owned in Wyoming and the Northwestern Territories are owned by foreign corporations, with their headquarters in London. Millions of dollars are thus invested. Those people have no interest in the United States except to have their cattle eat the free grass of the country. The Territorial Legislatures are their creatures; they put them there and they keep them there. They will name the cow-doctor who is to examine their herds. They bring cattle from Europe and all parts of the world, and when they have unprofitable stock, either barren or otherwise, which may have cost them a good deal, if this bill passes what is to prevent those foreign corporations and the Legislatures that they make and own from having those cattle killed in their interest and any price paid for them that they may see fit to demand?

Mr. MORGAN. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] are very pertinent and very forcible. More than that——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. MORGAN. Wait a moment. More than that, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] might have added that this very influence in the Northwestern Territories of the United States in the ownership of those enormous herds has found its way into the Parliament of Great Britain and the administration is now put severely to test. Gladstone's administration is being assailed and being put severely to test this very day in the Parliament of Great Britain in the controversy which has arisen between those very American herdsmen here and the government there in respect of the rejection of cattle from the Northwestern plains. That great and substantial government is to-day being agitated to its very core by the consideration of the question which those herdsmen in the Northwest, foreign men whose capital is here employed in the production of cattle, is pressing home upon the British Government, and now the English Government are being heard to say, and they published it in their blue-book within the last few days, an authentic declaration on the part of the government that the foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia have never yet found a lodgment in the United States except where they were exported from abroad. They have come down to an official declaration on that subject, and while they are trying to persuade their own people that there is no foot-and-mouth disease and no pleuro-pneumonia here, Senators on this floor, crazed with the idea that they are flattering the farmers and herdsmen of this country, are trying to make this part of the world believe that these diseases are all over this land.

That is the condition we are in. We are arguing and voting here to prove that there is an awful calamity resting upon or threatening the people of the United States, making it necessary that we should resort to very extraordinary powers, if we ever possessed anything like a shadow of what we are contending for, while the British people are being forced to the conclusion by their own government and by the pressure of the ownership of those herds in the Northwest by those British capitalists that the foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia do not exist in this country, or if they exist at all it is a mere sporadic affair caused by the importation of these diseases from abroad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there for one moment?

Mr. MORGAN. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator seems to assume that the persons who are urging this thing upon Congress are foreigners, and that a large majority of the cattle-owners of the West and Northwest are foreigners. That is a wide mistake, I assure the Senator from Alabama, because last year I happened to be in Chicago when there was a national meeting of the stock-raisers. Nearly all the great herds of the West were represented there. There were a little over five hundred gentlemen present, representing the stock-growing interest of the whole West and Northwest, and there was not one single foreigner in that assembly of as intelligent gentlemen as I ever saw in a legislative or any other assembly in my life. I know there are some foreigners who own herds.

Mr. BECK. Will my colleague allow me to ask him whether there are not organizations in England with tens of millions of dollars capital invested in herds of cattle over the Northwest? Is not that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We hear a great deal about it in the newspapers. I know one thing, because I have a great deal more familiarity with the cattle interest than my colleague——

Mr. BECK. I doubt it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know that not one-twentieth part of the cattle of the Northwest is owned by Englishmen or people of any other country except our own. I know there is not a foreigner in my State who owns a herd, and my State is as much interested in this question as any State in the Union. I know that those gentlemen who met in Chicago were not foreigners; they were American citizens and cattle-growers, and every single one of them joined in a resolution memorializing Congress for the passage of this or a similar bill to protect their interests.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not make any statement upon my own authority about the ownership of the herds in the Northwest. I have seen it stated in some of the official reports here. The Senator from Kentucky on my left [Mr. BECK] made the statement in respect of the ownership of those herds, and I find in the statement a very good reason why it is that the pressure of public opinion is getting to be so great upon the British Government as to cause them to assert now most solemnly that it is all a humbug about foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia existing in this country.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator certainly has some authority for that statement. He made it I supposed rather facetiously, but he is now making it seriously, and I call for his proof.

Mr. MORGAN. I will go to Republican papers, such as the New York Herald, the Tribune, and Times.

Mr. PLUMB. Those newspapers do not convey any such idea at all.

Mr. MORGAN. I beg pardon; they have contained such statements in the last three or four days. The Senator has been so busy about something else that he has not kept abreast of the question; he is quite behind on it. I have not thought it necessary to prepare myself with the papers here, but will do so before the debate is closed if the Senator wants to see them. Everybody else seems to know it except the Senator in charge of the bill.

Last Thursday or Friday, when the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] was arguing the question about the non-prevalence or non-existence of foot-and-mouth disease and pleuro-pneumonia west of the Alleghany Mountains, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] rose in his place and said he would admit that there was not any such case of disease west of the Alleghanies and never had been.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do say that, but——

Mr. MORGAN. Now, that is admitted again. That is a most remarkable thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will allow me for a moment in that connection, for I do not want him to cut my sentence in two, I said that it was not there, and it is because we want to keep it from getting there that I am so earnest in regard to the passage of this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. The leprosy has never been out in the Senator's section of the country either, and why not amend the bill so as to arrange for a board of doctors to investigate the subject of leprosy and to watch the lepers throughout the country and see if they can not prevent the leprosy from getting into Kentucky? What shall we not expect to do or attempt to do next? The cholera is not yet in Kentucky. It has been there in some preceding years. Let us have a board to prevent the ingress of cholera into the State of Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have we not such a board?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know of any.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator is wiser than I am in the matter if he thinks there is any cholera board here to prevent the introduction of cholera into Kentucky.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator certainly knows that we have a National Board of Health, whose principal duties have been transferred to the Marine-Hospital Bureau, and the law gives them power over the cholera, yellow-fever, small-pox, and all contagious and infectious diseases among men. I allude to the yellow-fever act, which is on the statute-book.

Mr. MORGAN. We have a National Board of Health, whose powers I am very glad to know have been transferred to some established organization under our laws, for the purpose of protecting the coast lines against the ingress of disease from foreign countries. We have bills reported here in the Senate now for the purpose of putting it into the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to establish quarantine upon our coast, to prevent the introduction from abroad of diseases of the very character that the Senator refers to.

What is desired in this bill is to supplement all legislation of that kind, to supplement the Cattle Commission of the Treasury Department that is now in operation and is now quite adequate I suppose to find out when disease gets to Kentucky. The worst feature of the bill that is now in contemplation is to find out whether disease may ever get there. The object of this bill is to supplement all of this with a bureau of animal industry. I do not object to that if a bureau of animal industry is wanted, and if we have not bureaus enough let us have some more. If there are not office-holders enough in the United States Government let us fix up a few more for the people to pay. A few hundred thousand dollars a year do not make any difference to a government as rich as this. It makes no difference if the people are poor, you have them under your feet, you can hold them down, and if you want to put your foot on their neck and crush them, that is all right; it is what you are doing in every respect anyhow. Put on the pressure, create a few more offices if you must have a bureau of animal industry, and if Kentucky is about to get diseased or sick for want of a bureau of animal industry I shall have to vote for that feature of the bill.

But the question I am discussing is the power you are going to give to the bureau after you get it created. Are you going to give them autocratic and discretionary power to do as they please, and that too in the face of the confessed fact that there is not and never has been a case west of the Alleghany Mountains of either of the diseases at which this bill is apparently leveled?

More than two-thirds, yes, nine-tenths, of the area of the United States never had a case in it of a disease of this kind, and in order to prevent its going there or to smooth down the anxious apprehensions of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the blooded-stock owners of that State we are to spend a large amount of money annually, and we are to confer extraordinary powers upon a board, the like of which no board has ever claimed even in the United States of America.

The yellow-fever board, the Board of Health, with all the control that it claimed over the health of the country and to prevent the death of thousands and tens of thousands of men, women, and children, never claimed the right to condemn their property out of hand and to burn their houses in order to stop the ravages of the disease. The most they could do was sanitation, medication, burial, food, and clothing, and the necessary appliances for restoration to health. It was never supposed that the Congress of the United States had a right to set a torch to Memphis and to burn it up in order to prevent the yellow-fever from raging through that city. But here you lay your knife to the throat of the cattle and property and you destroy pell-mell. You get a man who wants to magnify his office and wants to earn his $5,000 a year, or whatever it may be, with his twenty inspectors, or whatever the number may be, out of the public Treasury. He hunts and rummages about over the land until he finds what he conceives to be a case of pleuro-pneumonia. He raises a clamor about it. Of course it is re-echoed in the Senate of the United States, for it seems of late that the Senate has got to be little less than a mere sounding-board for the calamity and clamor which come up from the country, and after this clamor has been raised then legislation must supervene, the Constitution must get out of the way, arbitrary powers must be given to these men. Why? Because in hunting around, as these veterinary surgeons did, it appears in the State of Kansas they found a few cattle with frozen feet, and raised the cry that it was foot-and-mouth disease, had the Senate of the United States alarmed out of its propriety, and the governor of a State assembling a legislature in solemn conclave to meet that disease. When they got together the veterinary surgeons reversed their opinions very quietly; Kansas passed a few enactments on the subject of providing hereafter for scares of that kind, retired from the field, and left the country in peace. That is the situation.

I will assist the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] in getting up his pet scheme of an animal industry bureau and having some man to go there and preside over it, and some other man to nose about among the cattle of the country to see if he can not find some excuse for the act after we have passed it, but I can not consent, by my vote at least, to allow that individual or that bevy of men, whoever they may be, to take the laws of this country into their own hands and to treat property as they may see proper to treat it, destroy it at their own will and pleasure and pay for it at the price they please. I therefore move to strike out, first, that portion of the bill beginning in line 21 of section 3, as follows:

In paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter, and in such disinfection and other means as may be necessary to extirpate the disease.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I desire to say only a word or two in regard to this amendment. I am entirely willing to give the Commissioner of Agriculture, or any other official of this Government whom the Committee on Agriculture may see fit to select, the power to make all the investigation necessary into the origin of diseases of cattle and the character of them, to aid the States to quarantine against them, and to take all the necessary steps that the Government of the United States can place in the hands of any of its officials to protect the herds of the country. But when it comes to a power of indiscriminate slaughter and of paying what they please for anything, then I am opposed to that branch of it.

It is conceded by everybody, my colleague concedes it, that there is not a case west of the Alleghany Mountains to-day and never has been. That fact is established if authority can establish it. That being the case, what necessity is there to place in the hands of any body of men the power to slaughter the cattle of the country until we have a thorough investigation made first as to whether the disease exists anywhere in the country? Its existence is denied by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. My colleague, I believe, says he has seen cases right here, and of course that ends it; but it is denied by gentlemen representing the States named that it exists. It is admitted by my colleague himself that there is not a case and never has been in the State that he and I represent, or in any of the great States of the West where cattle are being raised by the thousands. Why, then, is it necessary to give this absolute power of slaughter?

I said a little while ago what I know to be true (although my colleague may have seen five hundred men at Chicago, and there were no Englishmen among them), that the largest cattle-raising corporations in the whole Northwest, especially in Texas, and in Wyoming and other Territories, are English companies, managed by their managers, owned abroad, people who have no interest in that soil except to have their cattle eat the free grass, and when they withdraw them there is nothing left in the Territory except the ground with the grass eaten from it.

Why, I ask, should those men have the power that the bill gives them to co-operate through the Territorial Legislatures that they themselves have placed there, their own cow-boys constituting part of them, and when they seek to make a sale of poor animals that they have brought from England or elsewhere, barren cows, if you please, as I said the other day, that they may have bought at from five to eight thousand dollars apiece and nobody knows they are worthless except themselves, they can by any fraud, by poison, by any means, make those worthless animals have the appearance of pleuro-pneumonia or any other disease and have them slaughtered and paid for at the price that they can prove they paid for them—why should that authority be given to anybody? Is every man who owns a cow or speculates in one necessarily honest? Are we to place ourselves at the mercy of all bodies of men everywhere in States and Territories who may become largely interested in having their own cattle slaughtered in order to get the price that they see fit to demand?

It is no unusual thing for the very highest-priced animals to prove utterly worthless for anything but beef prices. That I suppose we all know. Here is a bill without any limitation whatever. Whenever the Territorial Legislature and the Commissioner of Agriculture agree that any disease exists he can have them slaughtered and paid for without any limitatiom whatever. If we provide that beef prices shall be paid, that is one thing; if we are to pay the prices those gentlemen see fit to prove they paid in regard to some herds of Alderneys, Jerseys, or particular breeds of Durhams, that is another and a different thing and of much more danger.

We ought to so legislate at least as not to make it to the interest of any man in the United States to have his animals killed in order to get pay out of the United States Treasury. No man will deny that, I presume; and when it is admitted that there is not a case of the disease in any of the States west of the Alleghanies at least, and perhaps not even in the United States or in any of the great Territories, why is this haste, before an investigation is made, before any effort at quarantine has been made, before we have exhausted the power that we have a legitimate right to give to our Commissioner to prevent the propagation of it, to have a hue and cry raised such as was raised in Kansas the other day, whereupon we voted $50,000 for a myth, and it turned out, as the Commissioner of Agriculture now reports, that it was caused by the eating of ergot in bad rye? Why in advance of an investigation should we be paying this amount of money and placing it at the disposal of any officers of the Government or any combination of men or put it in the power of anybody to make it to their interest to defraud us?

That is the objection I have to this bill. If it is confined, as it ought to be in a preliminary investigation, to a thorough, comprehensive, careful examination into all the matters connected with the disease, to its transportation, to its movements, and to quarantine against it, to everything in regard to the cattle of the country, I will vote and vote freely for it; but the Committee on Agriculture, not content with that, begin by giving this power even to Territorial Legislatures. I have much less faith in them than I have in the Legislatures of States. I know how they are composed; I know who they are. It is no slander to say that in many of those Territories the cattle-owners send their own men to the Territorial Legislature, and nobody can go unless he is in the interest of those very cattle-owners; and as I know, and as anybody knows who takes care to investigate it, those cattle-men are made up of corporations, many of them foreign corporations, not even citizens of the United States. You propose to give the power to make the United States pay for any cattle that they can make any cow-doctor believe is diseased, if it is to their interest to make them appear to be diseased.

Mr. MORGAN. "Any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease."

Mr. BECK. Anything, no matter what; a "contagious, infectious, or communicable disease"—and then kill the animals by the hundred, kill all that are worthless, that they know are worthless, when nobody else knows whether they are worthless or not, and they are to be paid high prices for them after they are proved to be diseased.

I know of no such way of finding a market for useless animals as this bill would give to every dishonest man who saw fit to take advantage of it. There are dishonest men in all trades, I suppose. I presume there is no body of men who might be quite scrupulous in their dealings, or private men who would think it a particular hardship to take all they can get out of the Government of the United States.

Therefore, in the passage of this measure I shall insist, before it can get my vote, that it shall be limited to making the most thorough possible investigation, to establishing the most rigid quarantine which any State may see fit to impose, and to give our officers full power to co-operate with the local authorities everywhere in preventing the spread of the disease, in doing anything that is necessary.

Surely, as I said before, as there is none of the disease claimed to be in any of the great stock-raising regions of the West, none west of the Alleghanies, the information that we shall get under such a bill as I am willing to support will by next December enable us to take any further steps that the investigation may develop to be necessary, and if the quarantine that States see fit to establish is not as broad and as comprehensive as Congress may think it ought to be, Congress can then take the additional step.

In the mean time the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama I think ought to be agreed to, and the power to destroy the cattle, the power to commit fraud, should be guarded. I have named only the men in the extreme West because we know that there are many of them not our own citizens, and that their cattle are not seen by anybody but themselves and their employés, and there is no means of detection. If we should go into this matter now without further knowledge I think it would be a great mistake.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] rose I had prepared an amendment which I think would have obviated all this speaking and all this objection. The amendment I proposed was not to obviate any objection I had to the power or the propriety of its exercise when an emergency should arise, but simply to make the bill harmonious with itself. In the other House when the bill was under consideration it had a section 4 which provided in substance that if any State did not accede to the request of the Commissioner for co-operation, then the Commissioner of Agriculture, under the direction of the President, might proceed himself to very thorough and effective measures for the extirpation of the disease, including the destruction of animals. That section was stricken out. That made it unnecessary to have so much of the preceding section as provides for the destruction of animals. The Committee on Agriculture in considering this matter inserted what in its own opinion ought to be done, what the House had striken out.

I said in offering the bill to the consideration of the Senate the other day that I was willing that the section which the Committee on Agriculture had inserted should be stricken out. It has been stricken out, and I have designed to move myself an amendment, not going quite so far as that of the Senator from Alabama, which accomplishes the same purpose—at all events, the purpose which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has expressed.

The objection of the Senator from Alabama relates to the question of power. As much as I esteem that Senator, and with as much pleasure as I listen to him, I can not escape the conclusion that in some way unconsciously to himself he always speaks of this Government as though it was somebody else's Government and not his own. He has constantly in his mind the exercise of some power on the part of this Government, as though power to him was offensive, and I can not conceive how it could be offensive to a man who truly and rightfully regarded himself as a citizen of this great Republic and one of its servants. I do not object to the Government exercising power in places where the power is proper to be exercised and where it is necessary for the protection of the people and in the rightful assertion of its sovereignty, and whether it be the destruction of an infected animal or the quarantine of a community to prevent the spread of disease, if that be necessary for the general welfare, then it is plainly within the purview of the constitutional powers conferred upon Congress.

Something has been said about foreigners holding cattle in this country. I may say about that if I had my way I would not let them own cattle, land, or anything else; but it is inconceivable that cattle-men, whether they be Englishmen or whether they be Americans, would want to depreciate the value of their own products in foreign markets. They do not want to do that. It may be talked about just as men please; there is a great feeling of uneasiness about this matter throughout all the cattle-holding section of the country. I beg Senators to understand that Wyoming, the Northwest, the Southwest, and the extreme West do not own the most valuable herds in this country. They are only atoms in the great sum total of the forty or fifty million cattle that are held in this country, because the cattle held elsewhere are not only greater in number, but of a greater average value. The alarm once spread affects an interest so great, so widely spread over the country, that it takes a long time to eradicate even an idle rumor or an idle fear.

What we want is something that can do this and do it in such a way that the men with cattle on the prairies, or wherever they are, may go on about their business believing and realizing that there is a power strong enough and sufficiently armed with means to everywhere advise them in an authentic way of exactly what they have to fear, or, when they have no reason to fear, of that fact also. When the rumor was in the State of Kansas, to which allusion has been made, if the power given by this bill had been in existence that alarm would not have extended all over this country; we should have had means to have settled it. It has but recently been settled, if at all; only by a conference of men from different portions of the country to settle the question, and by experiments which could not be tried in a moment nor in a day, and by that very class of men that the Senator from Texas is so afraid of. He is afraid that they will say that is a disease which is not a disease, in order to justify their continuance in Government employ; but they did not say anything of that kind when they came to investigate the matter thoroughly. After giving plenty of time to determine in a practical way, they have determined that the disease did not exist, and until that was determined and until they did announce it there was not only a paralysis in that trade, but it stopped the immigration of people into that country, and the effect of it has spread to other States as well.

Since that has been done I have seen a dispatch in a Kansas paper to the effect that the governor of that State, under the authority of the law recently passed in Kansas, has been advised by the commission appointed by him to quarantine against cattle to be brought into Kansas from portions of Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Maryland lying east of the Alleghany Mountains, the whole of New Jersey and Delaware, and that part of New York lying south of the north line of Pennsylvania. There is an attempt on the part of a State to quarantine. It may be ineffective, but it expresses the ever-present fear; and the governor of that State is of the same politics as my friend from Alabama. I do not know but that he might be just as much afraid of the exercise of the same power, the same function by the General Government as is the Senator from Alabama; but in the presence of that which threatens the greatest interest in his State, himself a practical man, and interested with the people and interested himself in his own person and in his own pocket, he yields to the inevitable and has asked that the power shall be given to him by the Legislature of the State to control quarantine. But that will be ineffective. No one can tell whether the cattle coming into that State come from sections of the country that are infected or not. It can not be done; and if it could be done the Supreme Court has decided that the power thus sought to be exercised by the States is unconstitutional. It only remains, therefore, to deposit the power somewhere by law of Congress in such a way that it may be exercised for the benefit of all and in such a way that when it once is exercised the result may be satisfactory and give satisfactory assurance all around. That is all that is necessary.

The British Government have not, at least so far as I have seen—and I have read all the dispatches on that subject—committed themselves to the statement that no disease exists in our country, because there still remains the embargo against our cattle. I want to remove it. It has been said by individuals in Parliament that the disease did not exist; there has been confusion about it, some men wanting the cattle brought in without let or hinderance and other men contending for more strict legislation and a more close supervision; but after all the Government itself has not been convinced by these arguments to the extent of lifting the embargo that prevails against our cattle. A proper disposition is growing up now, and if something of this kind is not done and if we can not demonstrate in some authentic way to the British government and to all people that the cattle of America are not diseased, the cattle from the Northwest will take a route, not from New York and not from Baltimore, but they will be loaded on the upper lakes and carried on Canadian routes of travel and transportation in order to reach British ports as Canadian cattle and not as American cattle. It is an easy thing to be done.

Why this quarantine by the governor of Kansas on cattle coming from certain portions of the country if the disease does not exist? Why have commissions in New Jersey with a permanent annual appropriation for the purpose of stamping it out, with the results published to the world? Why the declarations made constantly by persons competent to know, as I think Senators on this floor are not competent to know, that the disease does exist not in an aggravated way, not all over the country, because no one has said that, but existing in such a way that unless some restriction, some investigation is had, it may spread, and the design of this bill is simply to prevent it and to enable us to give through the proper sources that will convey with authority the actual facts to people all over the world that American cattle are healthy, or if they are not healthy that disease is kept within certain small limits in such a way as to prevent the result of contagion to the great herds of the country or generally throughout the country?

Mr. President, I had prepared amendments to strike all of line 21 of section 3, and to strike out the words "to extirpate," in line 23, and insert words so as to make the clause read:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend as much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection, and in other means as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease.

That was the amendment which I prepared, and which I thought would cover all this question, and eliminate the objection which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] has made and others have made to the extraordinary power to be, as they thought, given by this bill.

But now in regard to that power, before anything can be done under this bill, even with the language which I propose to strike out, the governors of thirty-eight States have got to be consulted, they have got to have submitted to them the means, the appliances whereby this extirpation is to be carried on. It is not a thing to be hidden under a bushel, it is exposed to daylight, exposed to the criticism of the chief magistrates of thirty-eight States at a mutual conference between them, authorized by law, and forced not only by the sense of responsibility of the Commissioner of Agriculture acting under the order of the President, but by that of the governors of the several States themselves. I do not think it would be possible that we could deposit power anywhere subject to a more thorough supervision or one that would be less liable to be exercised in a doubtful way.

I know the idea that you can not submit anything to anybody for fear that we shall get some dishonest men in our employ who will beggar the Government is somewhat prevalent. I do not want to give doubtful power or one that may be extravagantly exercised to an official, but, as I have said, we have got to leave power with somebody. We appropriate lump sums to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, a million dollars here and a million dollars there, and so under other officials. We take all that risk; we must do it in carrying on great governmental purposes; and it is to the honor of the American people and to the credit of humanity generally that these trusts are rarely betrayed. I have no doubt that there will be some abuses under this bill or any other bill which we can pass which commits responsibility to anybody, but they are only such as are inevitable. There will be no more chance that this bill will result in some man's killing an animal to make the Government pay an extraordinary price for it than there will be that some man will himself buy an animal of that kind which he does not want, and pay more for it than it is worth.

Accidents will happen, and of course now and then there will be betrayals of trust; but they will only be such as I think are inevitable, and I do not object myself to conferring this power; and if it had not been for the determination of the committee to make this bill in harmony with a certain idea, to leave it as much as possible free from contest with the House, I would have insisted for myself, as I think the committee would have insisted, on this provision for payment as it originally was; but the fourth section having gone out, and this being a necessary adjunct to that and, standing alone, not necessary to the purpose of the bill as it is, with the fourth section out, I am entirely willing to have it modified; and I think the amendment which I have proposed better answers the purpose than that of the Senator from Alabama, and I think he will say so.

He proposed to limit the thing wholly to investigation, but it can not, even with the consent of the governor of a State, do anything for the purpose of disinfection and preventing the spread of disease. Why not let the States and the General Government co-operate in some way for the prevention of the spread of disease? Why limit it simply to investigation and report to Congress after the damage has been done? Why not do those things which can be done to co-operate fairly without the exercise of a doubtful power, or a great power not a doubtful one to prevent the spread of a disease, the spread of which may be injurious in the highest degree to the material interests of the people of the United States?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, in the chair). Does the Chair understand that the Senator from Kansas has offered an amendment?

Mr. PLUMB. I will offer an amendment if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it is in order.

Mr. MORGAN. It is in order as an amendment to my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Senator from Alabama moves to strike out lines 21, 22, and 23 of section 3. The object of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is to perfect the text, which takes precedence of a motion to strike out.

Mr. MORGAN. I was in no hurry to offer this amendment. I waited to see whether the committee or the Senator in charge of the bill intended to modify the bill to the effect he now suggests, and I am entirely willing to accept his modification. At the same time I think he leaves very dangerous words in the bill in line 22—"and in such disinfection and other means." The words "other means" I think are dangerous words in the text of the bill as it will stand if his amendment prevails. "Other means to prevent the spread of disease." That might include and I think would include perhaps the slaughtering of animals, whether it includes paying for them or not.

I do not wish to be hypercritical upon the text of this measure. I am willing, as I have announced before, that whatever powers we possess shall be exercised for the purpose of enabling the Agricultural Department to investigate and give full and rapid information as to the spread of the disease, and to make any recommendation that may be thought necessary toward its extirpation. The Senator from Kansas mistakes me very much if he supposes that I have any fear of the exercise of the powers of the Government of the United States. Very far from it. I think that I can show by the history of my brief course in this body that I have never hesitated to exercise the powers of the Government of the United States in any matter where the public necessity or general welfare required it. What I am afraid of about matters of this kind is myself and the Senator from Kansas. I am afraid of that disposition which all men entertain who are in power to assume undue authority to themselves. There is the trouble about our position here. I never believed that when the people of Alabama sent me here to this Senate they expected me to legislate on those subjects which are confided by the Constitution to the State authorities. There are a good many I could name, but I do not wish to be disagreeable about it, some of which have been recently exercised in my humble judgment.

I believe that I have come here for the purpose of exercising the constitutional functions of a Senator in respect to the powers of the Government of the United States, and I take this occasion to say that I will go perhaps beyond many Senators who are supposed to be liberal constructionists in the exercise of those powers of a national character which do belong to our Government, and I will state further that I do claim a good many of these powers from what is called international law, the traditions of governments in existence centuries before ours existed. I am proud to believe that the Government of the United States in all its foreign relations has power, except so far as it is restrained by the express terms of the Constitution, equivalent to that of any government in the world. I believe that the undervaluing of the powers of the Government of the United States in the particular to which I now refer has caused calamity to this country heretofore, and has caused us on some very important occasions to omit to do those things which were necessary for the national honor and the national glory and prosperity.

So it is not the Government of the United States and its powers that I fear, but it is the usurpation by members of the two Houses of authority which the Constitution has not conferred upon us, and especially so when we have a very plethoric Treasury behind us, with the temptation to make assaults upon it and find a convenient excuse and opportunity for continually pumping money out of that Treasury in order to gratify our constituents. There is where my fears come from.

I do not appreciate, as I have said before, that there is any great public demand or necessity for a bureau of animal industry. Still, as an honorable committee of this body have recommended it and have given assurance to the country that it is a necessary part or adjunct of the Government, I am willing to go to the extent of ordaining it and paying its regular allowance, putting it in place among the other bureaus, some of which have become so obsolete in respect of the powers they exercise as scarcely to be noted. I am willing to go to that extent; I am willing to give that bureau the power of investigation; but I am not prepared to say that I am willing to give to that bureau the power to act in co-operation with the State governments in devising the best plans of extirpating disease. At the same time, Mr. President, I think I can discover too broad language used in connection with the exercise of that power, which might become extremely dangerous in different parts of the country; I will not say North, South, East, and West, for it is as dangerous to one section as another. It is a more dangerous exercise of power perhaps to deprive the people along the crowded States of the Northern Atlantic coast of food at the proper rates of charge than it is to deprive the railway companies of the profit they make in the transportation or the herdsmen of the profit they would make in rearing cattle.

Now, suppose a case—not because I believe it will necessarily exist—but suppose a case that is within the probabilities of this bill. That is enough for me to say. Suppose that some of the States or Territories, Texas and Kansas and Colorado and Arizona and New Mexico, all of which are getting to be countries of immense importance in the rearing of cattle, desire to impose a commercial ban between that great storehouse of supply in the South and Southwest, to say that those cattle shall not go to market in the North and Northeast, or shall not go abroad, giving to men lying north and east of this boundary line the control of the market. Suppose that they should come to a conclusion or have a desire of that kind; it could be very easily accomplished. One or two States or Territories, acting in co-operation with the Commissioner of Agriculture, could say: "One of the means, 'the other means,' necessary to extirpate this disease is to prevent the introduction of these cattle, prevent their transportation, prevent them from passing through these different States." There you lodge a power in the hands of these different institutions of government, local and national, which you very poorly define. Your bill gives broad discretionary power.

You lodge the power, and then if it should be abused whom do you go to to make an inquiry in respect of the reasons why the power was thus abused? You must go to the Senate and the House; it is our duty in legislation to so guard our legislation as that there can be no loop-hole left whereby a man can abuse the real powers conferred and at the same time justify himself in public estimation as one who observes the law.

I am not afraid of the corrupt exercise of power by the States or even by the Territories, nor am I afraid of its corrupt exercise by the Commissioner of Agriculture. At the same time it is my duty, I think, to put the necessary guards into the bill so that it shall be a matter next to impossible that they can corruptly combine together for the purpose of controlling the markets in this country.

Now, I take occasion to say another thing. In making this argument I am arguing against what I believe to be the real interests of the Southern and Northwestern country, for if you may prevent Alabama cattle and Texas cattle from going to the grazing-grounds of Tennessee, Kentucky, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, for the purpose of being fattened for market; if you can pass a decree here constitutionally and lawfully that these cattle could never pass to the north of a certain line, because in passing to the north they might infect herds there with splenetic fever, I can understand at once that those cattle would rush to the ports of the South, and they would be loaded upon ships at New Orleans, and Mobile, and Pensacola, and Savannah, and Charleston for the purpose of being exported to the Northeastern markets along the Atlantic and for the purpose of being exported to Great Britain. I can understand that, and I can see how, if this bill had passed in the form in which it was originally presented, there would accrue doubtless to the people in the South and Southwest large commercial advantages from its enactment, for then we should have established our slaughtering-houses down in our own section of the country, and in refrigerator cars we would send our beef to New York, to Chicago, to Cincinnati, and to other places, instead of driving it or transporting it alive and slaughtering it in that country, where the profit of slaughter is very great. We should transfer that industry to the South and prepare the meat there for foreign use. I believe cattle-beef have gone from Texas ports to foreign countries and have been sold in the markets there.

But, sir, I was not referring to that in any remarks I have hitherto made in this matter. I was putting my case entirely upon what I believed to be the constitutional powers of this Senate, and seriously, as a Senator, I am denying to myself the right to exercise powers which are reserved in the Constitution of the country to the members of the Legislature of my own State. I do not wish on the floor of the Senate to legislate for Alabama in respect of her local and internal affairs. I do not wish to usurp the authority which belongs to men to whom the people of my State have constitutionally delegated it, and which supersede any right of mine to interfere in their affairs. If the State of Alabama from any public cause, from any calamitous event, gets into that condition where she must have the assistance of the Federal Government in aid of her domestic powers of quarantine or her police powers in order to preserve the health or the welfare or the peace of her people, I would not hesitate to vote a subvention to that State for her assistance; but in coming to that proposition I would leave my State free to judge and determine for herself, and I would not undertake to anticipate by what I might do on this floor those things that are left by the constitution of my own State in the hands of the representatives in the Legislature thereof.

That is the difference between myself and the Senator from Kansas, as I understand it. The Senator from Kansas must feel that he is here to legislate for his State, notwithstanding they have got a Legislature that can be convened continually and upon the slightest apprehension of danger, as they were the other day for the purpose of dealing with a question of this sort. Neither, sir, do I wish to come here and ask the people of the United States to vote $50,000 to help the State of Alabama repress any disease or calamity in that State. It is too small an amount of money. Our necessities are not as great as that. I hope they never will be.

Now, inasmuch as the amendment of the Senator from Kansas is before the Senate, and has precedence of mine because it is an amendment to perfect the text, I will move to strike out of the amendment of the Senator from Kansas the words "and other means," so as to leave some checks and guards upon the power that we confer on the Commissioner of Agriculture, for "other means" means all other means, any other means, every other means, and I think the qualification that would be put upon the text as offered by the Senator from Kansas by the striking out of these words would make this whole section acceptable, at least to myself. I trust the Senator from Kansas will not object to that amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I should not object to that except for this: I think in connection with the State there ought to be power to fix some sort of quarantine, not a very restrictive one perhaps, but not limited simply to disinfection. I do not think that the words "other means" there are objectionable, or that the means to be exercised there would be the kind the Senator from Alabama has indicated; but there ought to be some general term to express the exercise of such power as might be necessary in a given case in connection with the State authorities to not only disinfect but to quarantine, prevent the spread.

Mr. MORGAN. Put "quarantine" in, so that we shall understand what it means.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to putting in the words "disinfection and quarantine measures."

Mr. MORGAN. Very well; "and quarantine measures."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas modifies his amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I modify my amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be read as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out line 21, section 3, as follows:

In paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter.

And in line 22 of section 3 to strike out the words "and other means" and insert in lieu thereof "and quarantine measures." Also, in line 23, to strike out "extirpate" and insert "prevent the spread of;" so as to read:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations, and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Alabama withdraws his amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I listened to the law as advanced by the Senator from Alabama and my colleague and to their views on the general merits of the bill. So far as the law aspect of the question is concerned their position is that it is an interference with the right of a State for the National Government to aid it in the execution of a power clearly belonging to that State, even upon the request of that State, when the result to be accomplished by that joint action is to inure principally to the benefit of the whole people of the United States. They did not support that law by any argument or by any authority, and in my judgment it is not law at all. I have not come here fortified by an array of authorities, the decisions of courts, or the opinions of eminent statesmen upon this point, but I know it has been acted upon, and it has been decided that the National Government may aid the State in any lawful purpose where the benefit is general to the whole country.

The next proposition of both those gentlemen is that the individual whose property is interfered with must bear all the loss caused by detention or destruction, although it be done for the common good. That is not justice; that is not right. Both of them deny that any disease exists at all. Both of them say they are willing to vote for a bill that appropriates money to investigate the subject. Why, sir, we have had investigation going on for five years upon this very question. The very first year——

Mr. BECK. My colleague will allow me to remark that I said there was no disease at all west of the Alleghany Mountains, on his authority. That was it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I admit that; but the Senator from Alabama said there was not any anywhere, and the Senator from Texas said in his speech on Friday that there was not, and the Senator from New Jersey expressly declared that in his judgment there was none in his State or anywhere else.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I only said that the proof from the Senator from Kentucky who now has the floor was that there is not now and never has been a case of foot-and-mouth disease or pleuro-pneumonia west of the Alleghany Mountains.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I understood the Senator to say there was none anywhere else.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What were his remarks in relation to that?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not make any remarks on that point at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I misunderstood the Senator then, but I did not misunderstand the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Jersey. I am sure of that, because their speeches are both in the RECORD. But both the Senator from Alabama and my colleague have taken the ground that there is no necessity at present for anything but investigation. During the very first session of my service in this body I introduced a bill looking in the very same direction and substantially the same bill that is now before us, and I was met then with the objection that we wanted first to investigate. We had a long discussion for two sessions, and the result was that a commission which has been called the Treasury Cattle Commission was appointed, composed of two eminent veterinary surgeons, men of science, and one practical business man, to investigate this whole subject. They did proceed to investigate. They visited all the great cattle marts of the country, East and West. I hold in my hand the result of their labors for more than twelve months. They all say that no pleuro-pneumonia is known to exist west of the Alleghany Mountains, but they say that it is domiciled in five of the Atlantic States, around the very ports through which we ship our cattle abroad and through which we introduce those that we import for improving our own herds.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] said that no such disease existed in his State. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] relied upon him as very high and eminent authority, as being a farmer, a cattle-man, a trading man, and familiar with the whole business connected with cattle. I happened to turn back to the RECORD of one of the sessions a few years since, when the Senator from New Jersey made the following statement in a speech upon this floor in response to what had been said by the friends of the bill then pending, which was similar to the one now before the Senate:

Mr. MCPHERSON. May I interrupt the Senator a moment? I think the State of New Jersey has been slandered about enough without some attempt at defense. I wish to say to the honorable Senator that the people of New Jersey want neither sympathy nor charity. We have no diseased animals to send to Iowa or any other State. It is true there is some disease among animals in New Jersey, but it is found in stables where there is a heated and tainted atmosphere; but where the cattle are allowed to roam, as they are in the Western country, in the open air, and have pure and wholesome food, there is no difficulty. We have never known a case of disease in New Jersey except under the conditions I have named; and I believe that it is perfect nonsense to assert that pleuro-pneumonia or any other disease among cattle can be found in the Western country, where they have a wide range, with plenty of pure air and plenty of wholesome food. What disease we have in New Jersey—and I admit we have some there, and also in New York—is occasioned by the evils in transportation, by which animals are exposed to tortures and privations, brought to market and put in stables in a confined and heated air, and given unwholesome food, swill-slop, and so on.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Jersey if there have been any cases of pleuro-pneumonia in his State that he knows of?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not know what pleuro-pneumonia is.

There is the eminent veterinary surgeon, the honorable Senator from New Jersey who sets up his opinion against that of the Treasury Cattle Commission, composed of men selected specially for their fitness for that investigation, and whose authority my friend from Texas is so ready to adopt. He admitted that he knew nothing about it, and I am satisfied from his speech last made that he did not know anything about it, for I must say that I never heard as much ignorance expressed on a subject in so few words in all my life. The Senator is good authority on naval affairs but not good upon cattle diseases.

He further said that there was no disease in his opinion in his State. Now I want to look to that. They have in New Jersey a State cattle commission with veterinary surgeons and the whole machinery and paraphernalia for investigation and extermination of the disease, and the only thing needful with them is money enough to run that machine. Now what did the veterinary surgeon of that State say a few years since? After examination in nineteen counties he reports that he found the disease of pleuro-pneumonia in eleven counties, as follows:

Total inspections by counties from March 26 to December 15, 1879.

Counties.	Herds.	Number.	Sick.
Hudson	1,090	7,968	208

And yet the Senator from New Jersey says there is no disease in his State. This is a report made to his governor showing that three hundred and fifty-one animals were diseased with pleuro-pneumonia, enough to infect every herd in this whole country, in the one little State of New Jersey.

Several Senators have asked me to show where the disease now exists in the United States. "It has been denied," said one Senator to me, "by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Jersey that it has a domicile anywhere at this time in the United States." Now I will show where it exists by the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission that we authorized by law and paid a salary for their labors in investigating this disease. They say:

THE PLAGUE IN NO WAY DISAPPEARING.

While we submit the above undeniable proof of the absence of the lung-plague from the West—

These very gentlemen state that they had examined all the great cattle-marts of the West and found none there—we are not to be held as for a moment indorsing the optimist views of some as to its decline in the East. The governor of New York, in his annual message, congratulates the State "that while the cattle disease, known as pleuro-pneumonia, which formerly menaced the farmers in this State, is not entirely eradicated, it has been confined to limited areas, and seems to be gradually disappearing. With a single exception, not likely to cause further trouble, the disease has been confined to a small portion of Long Island, and it is hoped that it may be speedily and entirely eliminated from our territory."

That is what the governor says in his message. Here is what the commission say:

It is much to be regretted that the governor should have been so far misled. He has in his regular employ no professional inspectors to inquire into the status of the disease in the State, and manifestly trusts to the owners of diseased herds to report to his office. Every one acquainted with the disease knows that this is the last thing the city dairyman would think of doing, and therefore the fact that no such reports have been made by no means implies that the disease does not exist.

So much for New York. They further say:

An impression has been created that the disease has now very little prevalence in New Jersey, but in a visit to Newark, on January 2 and 3, Professor Law found within the limits of a single street at Orange four infected herds, while others were reported in adjacent villages. So far as could be learned, not one of these had been visited or put under any restriction on behalf of the State.

So much with regard to New Jersey.

With regard to Pennsylvania, it may be said that in spite of a very liberal system of indemnity, which is one of the most effective measures that can be devised, the disease was at first perpetuated by the preservation of chronic cases, and throughout by the admission of cattle from all sources and for all purposes—store and beef—into a common market. It is understood that chronic cases are now condemned, but on the other hand the indemnity has been reduced from sound value to one-half, and this, together with the infected markets, have so far served to keep up the disease.

And I noticed this morning in the papers that this very disease has broken out in Washington County, Pennsylvania; that veterinaries have been sent to that place who have telegraphed to the governor and asked him to quarantine Washington County. In that connection let me present a letter from a member of the other House:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1884.

DEAR SIR: A disease, thought by local medical men to be pleuro-pneumonia, has broken out in Cross Creek Township, in Washington County. I went several days since to Hon. G. B. Loring, and he promised to send his veterinary surgeon as soon as he returned from the West, and he expected he would return that day. Several cattle in a valuable herd of Mr. Vance, of our county, have died. This is all the information I have on the subject.

Yours, truly,

G. V. LAWRENCE.

Hon. J. I. MITCHELL.

GENERAL WILLIAMS: This is in reply to my inquiry.

Very respectfully,

JNO. I. MITCHELL.

I continue with the report of the Treasury Cattle Commission:

In Maryland a commission was created to attend to the disease, but we have learned nothing of their doings. A State veterinarian was also appointed with orders to report, for the governor's action, all cases of the plague. Extensive prevalence of lung plague was discovered, but we have not learned that the governor has taken any active measures to stamp out the affection. In the old stock-yards on Baltimore street (Baltimore and Potomac, and Pennsylvania) we found on inquiry that cattle from all quarters are admitted indiscriminately, whether from the infected city stables or the uninfected Western States, and that cattle for export, and those for store purposes at home, are shipped to their destination from these inclosures so recklessly exposed to infection.

The result has been that New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania have made frequent complaints of infection introduced into these States by infected cattle from Baltimore, and even in Washington we were informed of infected cows having been sent to that city from the capital of Maryland. Partly to remedy this state of things, new stock-yards (Baltimore and Ohio) have been constructed at Baltimore, into which, we were informed, only Western and Southern cattle were to be admitted, but here again a fatal blunder was committed; Virginia was accounted a Southern State, Virginia cattle were admitted, and as a result on the first day the yards were open four chronic cases of lung-plague were detected in them.

* * * * * * * *

The ports of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, being situated in infected localities, and the stock-yards at each of these places being open to cattle from all sources, including the infected vicinity, it is manifest that even Western cattle, coming through these yards and shipped from these ports, can not be guaranteed free from the germs of this plague.

Is not this proof? Will any Senator deny that the evidence of these men should weigh far more with this body than the loose statements of the men around the cattle-yards? The Senator from Texas read with great exultation some statements from Chicago and one from East Liberty, one of the great yards near Pittsburgh, in which the men stated that they had never known a case of pleuro-pneumonia there.

Now, Mr. President and Senators, whose testimony shall we take; the cow-boys, the commission men of the stock-yards, or the intelligent, scientific surgeons and physicians whom we have selected to make this investigation, which they have reported elaborately in the book before me to the Congress of the United States? The last men in the world to look to for information would be those about the cattle-yards. They are interested in keeping it back. They get their commissions; they get pay for the use of the cattle-pens whether the cattle are sick or well; they feel no interest in reporting cases.

Another fact is that cattle-traders carry their cattle to these cattle-yards to sell, and not to bury. They do not take cattle there that are reeling as they walk with disease in an advanced stage. If one of their herds becomes infected they pick out such as they think will live through the voyage, live to reach the market. So they do not take any cattle that are far advanced in disease or in any advanced stages of it. They take only such as will look well and are apparently in good health; and hence these cattle-yards are the worst places in the world to detect the presence of infectious disease, and they are the best places to disseminate it.

Do you suppose that these men are going to report it? Do you suppose that the owner of a dairy is going to report it? Never. They make money in the dairies whether the cows take the disease and die or not. A cow gives fifteen to twenty quarts of milk a day, which is sold at 10 cents a quart, which is $2 a day for the cow; for one month it is $60, and it costs but $4 a month to keep her. If she lives two months, which she is likely to do and almost certain to do, because this is not a rapid disease, the man may keep the cow and the moment she gets sick take her to a butcher and get half price, and fill up her place with a fresh cow and go on and make money.

The report of the Cattle Commission shows that the dairymen make enormous profits by losing half their cows every year. It is easily seen why these people are not interested in uncovering the disease. The moment a cow begins to decline in her milk, while yet in pretty good flesh, they slip her off and sell her to a butcher, and sometimes some of us, this very day probably, have breakfasted on steaks made out of cows taken from the dairies in this way and slaughtered.

So far, Mr. President, as co-operative action between the States and the General Government is concerned, these very Treasury cattle commissioners recommend it in preference to all other modes. It is the very one suggested in the bill, and I will read to the Senate what they say on that subject. It is very short:

REASONS FOR FEDERAL ACTION.

First. The disease is like a common enemy, and as the Constitution does not forbid the operation of the Federal Government within a State for the repulsion or extinction of an enemy of the nation, so nothing should hinder a similar action with such a dangerous and insidious enemy as lung-plague.

Second. The danger being common, the funds to avert the danger should be supplied out of the national exchequer.

Third. Action under one controlling head will be uniform and harmonious everywhere. In the past the conflicting laws and orders in two adjacent States have been most perplexing to dealers and others, and have furnished a temptation to smuggling.

Fourth. Those that transgress the law, and especially in the matter of smuggling, can be seized and punished anywhere by Federal authority, but not by State authority should they have escaped over the State line.

Fifth. Federal authority can follow smuggled cattle into any State or Territory and confiscate them or quarantine; State authority can not.

Sixth. If the Federal Government can not interfere within a State, such State may neglect this disease indefinitely and render it permanent, to the peril of all the others.

Seventh. The British Government declines to accept the assurances of the individual States, and will only accept the guarantee of the Federal Government that any infectious disease has been thoroughly stamped out or its extension beyond the infected regions effectually provided against. To secure this directly and without possible objection, the Federal Government must so connect itself with this work as to be able to attest the results.

REASON FOR STATE ACTION.

One great advantage of suppressive measures by State governments is that the latter can command the active co-operation of municipal authorities and police, and thus without any extra outlay can thoroughly control all movement of cattle and insure a speedy extinction of the disease. It is sincerely to be hoped that in case the matter is placed entirely in the hands of Federal authorities such invaluable help will be freely accorded them by order of the mayors of the cities or governors of the States. Any co-operation of this kind, however, must be hearty and thorough in order to be of any material advantage to the work.

Professor Law was here the other day, and he told me that after looking over the whole subject for four or five years he was satisfied that the best bill that could be passed would be one that would provide for co-operative action between the States and the National Government; that the States are as anxious to co-operate with us as we are with them; that all the States where the infection now exists had ample laws and machinery in operation ready for its extinction provided they had the money to run that machinery with. He said the difficulty was the States would not appropriate money enough.

Mr. President, I did not intend to make a speeeh when I arose, but I felt it incumbent on me to answer the statement made by the Senator from Texas and the Senator from New Jersey two or three days since, in which they asked with an air of triumph where the disease was to be found. If the gentlemen had read carefully, as they might have done, this report of the Treasury Cattle Commission which they were instrumental in having made, they would have known without making the interrogatory where the disease would be found. I felt it incumbent on me to answer that.

So far as the English Government is concerned, I notice in the papers of the last two or three days that a bill has been returned to the House of Commons, recommended unanimously by a committee for its passage, to authorize the privy council absolutely to prohibit the introduction of cattle from any foreign country unless they are accompanied by an assurance that the disease does not exist in that country, putting the entire onus of proof on the country from which the cattle come. When that is done we shall lose our cattle trade entirely with Great Britain. That bill is now pending before the British House of Commons, and it will undoubtedly pass.

Gentlemen say the whole of these restrictions are gotten up in Great Britain in the interest of the cattle-men of that country; that the Government is lending itself to them. This is a wide mistake. The Government of Great Britain is more interested than any government on earth in free trade in bread and meat. She has thirty-six million people, and does not raise half enough bread to feed them. She has but six million cattle, not one-sixth of what would be necessary to feed her people if beef was abundant and cheap. We have one head of cattle in this country for every human being; Great Britain has but one to every six, and it has been the study of that government ever since the time of Sir Robert Peel and Cobden in the passage of free-trade laws to increase the meat supply of that country. In 1842 they threw open their ports to the cattle of the world, and Great Britain was soon inundated with diseases imported from the continent of Europe, and with pleuro-pneumonia chief among them.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him a moment in connection with the subject to which he is now directing his attention—that is, the probable action of Great Britain?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. I noticed yesterday, Mr. President, the dispatches in the papers to which the Senator has referred with regard to the probable action of the British Government. The people of the State of Iowa, feeling a great deal of interest in the subject involved in this pending bill, I took occasion to-day to address a note to the Commissioner of Agriculture, asking him whether he had any information not generally known concerning the action of the British Government. I received a reply from him which treats of that in part, and also treats of the subject of cattle diseases in some other respects. If the Senator will yield for the purpose I will have it read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield with pleasure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The communication will be read by the Secretary.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1884.

SIR: In reply to yours of this date, allow me to state we are informed by the latest intelligence from England that the exclusion of cattle for one year at least has been determined on by Parliament. It is understood there and here that Mr. Gladstone's defeat on the foot-and-mouth disease in the United States indicates that the cattle-men in England are determined to keep out American beef.

I desire to state in addition that the cattle disease in Kansas and Illinois has been carefully investigated by Professor Salmon, the veterinarian of this Department, and has been found not to be foot-and-mouth disease, but gangrene caused by ergot, an opinion with which most of the local authorities now agree. Dr. McEachran, a veterinarian from Canada, however, insists still, I am told, that the disease is foot-and-mouth disease, and that while gangrene in the human subject may be caused by ergot, he has never learned that it occurs in cattle from the same cause, and this notwithstanding well-known published authorities to this effect. It is understood that Dr. McEachran proposes to report his views to the English Government for the guidance of their policy toward the United States on the cattle question.

From this it is manifest that if there was ever a time when the condition of American cattle should be thoroughly understood and the spread of all contagious diseases guarded against for the benefit of the breeder and feeder, both in the domestic and the foreign market, it is now.

American meat products, both on the foot and slaughtered, are entitled to the confidence of the consumer; and the assurance that the Government is caring for its good condition will do much to inspire this confidence at home and abroad, and to protect the vast animal industry of the country against suspicion and unreasonable attack.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GEO. B. LORING,
Commissioner of Agriculture.

Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, United States Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator from Iowa for that interruption. It is exactly in the line of my own argument and my own views.

I was going on to say that the rule and policy of the British Government for one hundred years has been to secure its supplies, if not at home, from her own colonial possessions. Her population increased in the small pent-up isle until it pressed upon home subsistence, so that she could not feed her people with the products of her own soil. Then the policy of feeding them from her own colonial possessions began. She bent her influence to afford her people free corn and cattle.

I was saying when this interruption took place that when she opened her ports cattle came in and they brought diseases with them which decimated her domestic herds, and after losing to her people $400,000,000 by the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia, and after spending uncounted millions in efforts to extirminate it, she appointed a commission to investigate cattle diseases in connection with the supply of meat and milk; and that commission, after a careful and thorough and exhaustive investigation, submitted a report to the government that notwithstanding the millions of cattle that had been brought into the country by free trade, yet the meat supply of Great Britain had not been increased, because the diseases introduced by the imported cattle killed more native ones than the supply by importation.

What a fact that is! Her policy was to plant colonies in South Africa at Cape Town, one of the finest grazing countries under the sun, a vast extent of country 3,000 miles in length and 2,400 in breadth, covered with grass tall and waving, like the richest prairies of our own West. She started population there; she started the rearing of cattle there; she did the same thing in Australia, but accidentally a few animals infected with this disease were sent there for the purpose of improving the native herds, and they communicated the disease by infection and destroyed in both those countries all the great cattle ranches upon which she expected at some future day to rely for her supply of meat.

The disease has destroyed the cattle in Eastern Europe to the Carpathians, to the Tyrol, to the great steppes of Russia, and Europe can no longer furnish the supply needed to England; and that is the reason of the recent demand for American cattle; and, Senators, if we act wisely we shall make provision for the re-establishment of our cattle trade with Europe upon a basis that shall be enduring; but it can not be done unless we eradicate a disease of which Great Britain is afraid. She has exterminated pleuro-pneumonia in her own country practically, and while she has spent millions of money to do that, she does not want to introduce it from other countries; and I say she is right.

No man can say that the British Government is opposed to healthy cattle coming from foreign countries; no man can say that she is in collusion with a few hundred cattle-raisers, the dukes and noblemen of the country, who own great estates. She has not one-sixth enough cattle to feed her own people if beef was cheap and abundant as it would be if we could send her our healthy herds to-day. No doubt the owners of cattle estates in England are glad of the embargo and interdiction, but the government can not be blamed for it. That government is the most paternal in the world. It protects its citizens. Wherever the British flag floats a British subject is safe under its protection.

No nation looks to the interests of its people as Great Britain does. Tell me that she is in the interest of a few cattle-men in England, and would close her ports against all the world! I know that the graziers in England and Ireland would be glad to see the ports thrown open to-day, and the English Government would be glad to throw them open if they thought that they could do it without introducing disease from this country. That we have it here there can be no sort of question. It is useless to disguise or deny the fact. It is useless to attempt to deceive the world. We can not do it. It is here. It is here to stay unless it is grappled with by the strong arm of the National Government and pulled up by the roots. The States will not do it, and the National Government must, if it expects to provide a market for its people.

Just think of us with our 50,000,000 cattle. Suppose we shipped 2,000,000 of them only to England, and England can take that number. They would be worth not less than $100 apiece in England. There is $200,000,000. Then we could ship $150,000,000 of pork, making $350,000,000, and we could increase this amount indefinitely, which would be far more profitable than our present market for grain.

I will not speak any more. I would a great deal rather come to a vote on the question. I am satisfied that the bill is going to pass, and it ought to pass. I know that the whole people of the West favor it, whatever else a few cattle-commission men and cow-boys about the yards may say—men who buy the cattle and take them to their stalls. They are the men and the commission men who sell them in the yards who are opposing this bill, and not the people who are raising the cattle.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I shall occupy the attention of the Senate but for a moment, and merely to say that it seems to me the advices from abroad which appeared in the papers of yesterday and the letter read at the desk a few minutes ago from the Commissioner of Agriculture put us in possession of an important fact, which is that the British Government is proposing affirmative action against the introduction of American cattle into England. That antagonizes what has been a pretty important feature in the matter of dollars and cents in the foreign commerce of this country. That fact we have in possession.

Now, it seems to me that the suggestion made by the Commissioner of Agriculture in the letter read is a very practical one in view of that fact, that suggestion being that inasmuch as this affirmative position in hostility to that branch of our commerce is being taken by Great Britain, it is proper not to say necessary for us to manifest a determination on the part of this Government to give our cattle a good bill of health as we put them into the foreign commerce. Take the fact of the attitude of the British Government and take that suggestion which will have a tendency to modify, if not change entirely that action abroad, and it seems to me we have in the two facts an argument that ought to have some weight toward inducing the Senate to pass this bill. This will be a step in the direction of inducing foreign governments to withhold their hostile action against us, showing upon our part our determination to protect our cattle against disease in order that those that go into our foreign commerce shall go with a clean bill of health.

I do not care to occupy the attention of the Senate longer on this bill. The great interest that the people of my State feel in it has induced me to say that the facts stated and the suggestions made by the Commissioner of Agriculture ought to have considerable weight in inducing the passage of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Several SENATORS. Let it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 3 it is proposed to strike out line 21, as follows: "In paying for the animals it is deemed necessary to slaughter;" in line 22 to strike out "other means" and insert "and quarantine measures;" and in line 23 to strike out "extirpate" and insert "prevent the spread of;" so that the clause will read:

> The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. Now that that amendment has been adopted, I suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the necessity for an appropriation of half a million dollars is obviated. By section 10, $500,000 is made immediately available. I suggest to the Senator that $50,000 is a very ample amount for the objects to which this bill has been reduced, and therefore I move that amendment, or rather I would prefer that he should move it.

Mr. PLUMB. I was going to move an amendment, but not to reduce the amount quite so much as the Senator from Delaware proposes to reduce it. I think the amount ought to be larger than that he names; but I call his attention to the fact that it is not now $500,000 but only $250,000 as the bill came from the House.

Mr. BAYARD. What does the Senator propose to make it?

Mr. PLUMB. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars. I move in section 10 to make the sum $150,000.

Mr. BAYARD. I move to amend the amendment by making the amount $50,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] moves to amend by striking out "two," in section 10, line 1, and inserting "one;" so as to read: "That the sum of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, to be immediately available," &c.

Mr. PLUMB. I hope the Senator from Delaware will think better of his proposition, or at all events that the Senate will not adopt it. This is not only a matter of great importance but every interest that inspires this investigation now, if it shall be undertaken, requires that it shall be so thorough that there can be nothing left in the shape of question hereafter about the result of it. Let it be made so thorough that when Congress assembles next December we may know then whether we need to do anything further or not to put ourselves in the position we ought to occupy in order not only to give security at home but give currency to this great product of ours abroad.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Kansas by striking out "one hundred and ;" so as to read: "That the sum of fifty thousand dollars," &c.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the sum of $100,000, the difference between my suggestion and that of the Senator from Kansas, seems a very immaterial matter in these days, when we are dealing so magnificently with public moneys and are resorting to very easy methods of spending that to which we do not personally contribute. I have no doubt that in the vast business to which this whole question relates, the cattle of a single State, the great empire, Texas, being counted by the million, such a sum as $100,000 may seem very small, and I do not doubt that it is a very small sum in proportion to the value of the interest at stake.

My objection to this whole bill is not simply the question of expense, because I believe that if there was an intelligent ownership, a private ownership of the cattle to be affected by this measure on the one hand, and the possibility of eradicating or preventing this spread of disease on the other, the amount originally mentioned in this bill of half a million dollars might be very economically and wisely dispensed. That is not the state of the case, for the Government of this country is not the owner of those cattle, nor responsible for their health.

This bill is nothing in the world but another illustration of the principle of socialism that is fast growing under our practices of legislation and penetrating every branch of this Government and entering into almost every detail of our public expenditure. Who ever before heard that the private property of citizens, existing in the shape of live-stock, horses, horned cattle, animals of any description, was to be protected against disaster and disease at the cost of the Government of the United States; that Congress, at the public cost, was to become the veterinary surgeon for all the sick animals throughout the country?

Why, Mr. President, if we were sitting here as the Legislature of one of the States, with that greater breadth of jurisdiction and absence of limitation that belongs to the government of the States, as compared to this Government of delegated powers of the union of the States, such a measure as this would be in my opinion most questionable and dangerous. Even if, under our limitations of power, we were permitted legitimately to pass this measure of local and individual and class relief, it would not in my judgment be a wise thing for the Government to be intervening as this bill now proposes, and others will soon further intervene and substitute the money of the community and the legislative care of Congress for the individual energy, prudence, and self-preservation of the citizens.

Day by day the doctrines and practices of a paternal government are speciously and tentatively expanding over the country, and the habit of popular thought is unhappily becoming accustomed to them.

Under a popular Government like ours I can see nothing but ruin and confusion in pursuing such a course of legislation, in which the true objects and legitimate functions of our form of government are wholly overlooked, and there is great danger that its powers will be transferred into the hands of the strong under the plea and pretense of protecting and aiding the weak.

What does this measure propose? That cattle, the private property of citizens, which are afflicted or threatened by diseases of a certain nature shall be cared for, cured, or, if necessary, killed, and the spread of the disease by such means averted or the ailment eradicated. And how is this to be done? By the owner? By the local authorities? No, the owner is to be relieved from all expense or duty in relation to his property, nor are the police powers and local government to be intrusted with the protection of the community. But the Treasury of the people of the United States is to be opened, and at their expense and by the active agency of their officials the work is to be done. In other words, the business of insurance against disease and other dangers incident to the business of cattle-raising is to be adopted by Congress at the cost of the public.

Disease and death among cattle are sometimes inevitable and the owner must expect to meet them and cure or avoid them or suffer the loss. His prudence, his care, are the true safeguards. Extend the proposition and principle of this bill and what private loss and adversity must not be cared for and compensated out of the public Treasury? Extend even the classification of diseases and what will it lead to? That the Congress and Treasury of the United States shall become insurers, gratis, against misfortunes and accidents which in the common course of nature assail every species of useful and valuable domestic animals.

I do not see where Senators are to draw the line between remunerating the owner of a sick horse or cow or a sick sheep or any other animal, and remunerating him for the loss of domestic service from an epidemic and contagious disease that has caused the illness of a wife or child or laborer or whoever else may contribute to the support of his family; and yet that is what this bill in its principle and effect surely contains. Misfortune comes in a thousand shapes; it is inherent to human affairs, and whether it shall come by fire or by flood, or on the wings of pestilence, whether it shall ravage herds and flocks of cattle or invade human habitations and carry with it death, desolation, and loss, yet it is incident to human life and part of its checkered dispensations. Such trials and losses must be met by individual energies and the sense and duty of individual self-protection. The community is not to bear such losses nor assume to compensate the losers.

Such misfortunes do not constitute a legitimate ground for resort to society at large for compensation. If a government shall assume the care, control, and compensation for such losses of its individual members, what is the result? Communism, socialism, in which individual liberty and independence is merged and lost.

This is what is illustrated by the principle of the bill which the Senate is now considering. I commend to the Senate an article now in my hand, written by one of the foremost thinkers of the day, who lately in this country was warmly welcomed by its highest intelligence, and is admitted to be a political instructor of authority. Mr. Herbert Spencer, in an article on the "Coming slavery" in the Contemporary Review of this month states his views, which may be read with profit by those who are seeking by legislation to relieve every difficulty incident to human affairs and to find by governmental intervention a cure for every evil. To us who are bound by the limitations of a written charter of powers which we have each sworn to support it seems to me his language ought to appeal with additional force.

I beg leave to read from his article upon the futility and danger of constant intervention by official power, and to show how "the liberties of a people must be surrendered in proportion as their material welfares were cared for."

> There does not occur the inquiry whether there are at work other agencies capable of dealing with evils, and whether the evils in question may not be among those which are best dealt with by these other agencies. And obviously, the more numerous governmental interventions become the more confirmed does this habit of thought grow, and the more loud and perpetual the demands for intervention. Every extension of the regulative policy involves an addition to the regulative agents—a further growth of officialism and an increasing power of the organization formed of officials.

This bill is palpably a step in that direction. I could find I think good reason for challenging the right of any constitutional statesman to vote as is found on pages 3 and 4 for a power in the President of the United States upon information derived from the Commissioner of Agriculture, to declare that any State or Territory of this Union or any part of a State or Territory of this Union is dangerous to the animal interests of this country, and may be put in quarantine, and that he may regulate or prohibit the transportation of cattle out of said State, Territory, or district. Was there ever so wild a project as that? What becomes of that clause of the Constitution which prohibits duties upon exports from any State? What becomes of that clause of the Constitution that prohibits Congress, much less the President or the head of the Agricultural Department, from quarantining, prohibiting the exportation of cattle from a State or any part of a State which may be declared to be dangerous to the animal interests of the country? Mr. President, this clause may be dangerous to the animal interests of the country, and I declare that section is a blow to the integrity of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. HAWLEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do it for my own information. Am I mistaken in supposing that that paragraph upon which he is commenting has been disagreed to, the paragraph in italics reported as the recommendation of the committee?

Mr. PLUMB. It has been disagreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not in the bill now. I agree with the comments of the Senator from Delaware, or if that paragraph were there I should agree with him entirely.

Mr. BAYARD. I was not aware of the fact that it had been stricken out.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me another suggestion? I think another line to which he objects and I would object also is out.

Mr. BAYARD. Do I understand the Senator to say that the language in italics, from line 28, at the bottom of page 3, in section 4, to line 4, at the end of the section, has been stricken from the bill?

Mr. HAWLEY. It has been disagreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. HAWLEY. There is another change in the bill which will assist the Senator as it has me in favoring the bill perhaps, and that is that line 21, section 3, on page 3, has been stricken out also.

Mr. BAYARD. I was aware of that, and it was upon that that I moved my amendment to cut down the amount of the appropriation; and I believe also that section 4 has been stricken from the bill. I ask the Chair if that is so, or I ask the Senator from Kansas who has charge of the bill whether section 4 has been stricken out?

Mr. PLUMB. Section 4 has not been stricken out, and it is not my purpose at all events to strike it out. I think that is a proper section to retain in the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Did I not understand the Senator that it was the intention to strike it out?

Mr. PLUMB. I spoke of section 4 of another bill, the words of which are precisely the same as the portion in italics which has been stricken out.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the fourth section of the bill is wellnigh as objectionable as the lines of the twelfth section, which my friend from Connecticut tells me have been stricken out, because it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to establish regulations for the exportation and transportation of live-stock without limit, because it can be such as the investigations may require in the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Treasury. So that in the face of the Constitution expressly prohibiting the granting of preference to the ports of any State over another, prohibiting the Government of the United States from laying any export tax whatever, there is here a grant of power to these two departmental officers to regulate at their own will the exportation and transportation of live-stock from any State of the Union—to allow as to some States, and deny it as to others, thereby creating a preference expressly forbidden by the Constitution.

Mr. President, I regret to say that from recent experience I believe appeals for the restrictions of power by Congress to the limits of the Constitution are of little avail. I am perfectly aware, for reasons that are not very hard to find, that the doctrine of strict construction of the Constitution which was at one time steadily and faithfully upheld in a large portion of the Union, meets now but little regard and has little weight; but I am glad to believe also that, though it is coming slowly, there is rising surely in this country a belief that liberty, civil, religious, and political, has its best chance for perpetuation under this selected instrument and scheme of government, the Constitution of the United States, that the necessities of local self-government are being better appreciated in certain sections of the country where, in my humble judgment, they were too little regarded in times gone by. There was a time not long ago when appeals for the conservation of local self-government and State rights fell upon the ear of the people of the Northern States as synonyms for the defense of negro slavery, and therefore the phrases became odious to such hearers because of their association, and a man could scarcely speak of State rights and local self-government of a strict construction of the powers of Congress but he was at once set down as a sympathizer or an advocate of the system of negro slavery.

Slavery, thank God, is dead. It has perished; it no longer has existence in this land. But the need of State rights, of local self-government, of a limitation of the authority of Congress to the delegated powers of the Constitution does exist, and never were more needed than they are to-day to protect property and individual liberty. In the face of a bill like this, where the functions of Government are sought to be perverted into channels of private relief, and individual and State duty and power are to be supplanted by the officials and money of the Federal Goverment, the necessity of appealing to a stricter construction of the Constitution is indeed manifest. Whether such appeals will be heeded or heard with favor in this Chamber I have but too much reason to doubt; but it will be heard outside, and it will meet with respect and attention outside of Congress; and I mistake greatly if the complexion of those Congresses which are to assemble hereafter will not be determined in large measure by the respect paid to those restraints upon Congressional powers which are essential for personal liberty and local self-government, which are intended to repress the socialistic tendency and principle of which this bill is but an exemplar. This constant intervention by Government in tasks that belong to the individual, and which American citizenship needs for its development and its proper exercise, must cease, or ours will become as bureaucratic a government as that of Russia.

Therefore, sir, even if my votes may not be effective, and there may not be a popular echo and a response to the views that I express, it shall not cause me to be silent, for I utter them under a profound conviction of their truth. They were true when the Government was founded, and our fathers looking forward saw that these checks and balances of power were required over a country as circumscribed in space and scant in population as ours was then; and every reason that made local self-government and individual effort necessary one hundred years ago is multiplied to-day and exists in greater force than ever. I can not see how any man can look over this land with its immense area, with the diversity of habits of occupation, the necessities of all those interests that may seem to clash in rivalry, but which properly considered are simply constituents each of the other, and under the theory on which this Government was formed and established can and will, under the free impulse of American institutions and American manhood, find abundant remedy for all important local tasks and duties in the management of which we are threatened with the pernicious, useless, this worse than useless intervention by the General Government with its multiplying officials and overflowing Treasury.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand the Senator from Delaware to take the ground that it is not competent or constitutional for Congress to grant powers to make rules and regulations or to declare quarantine against foreign nations or foreign commerce. I understand it to be his position that it is not constitutional for Congress to grant that power to any officer of the Government. I do not understand it so. I ask the Senator from Delaware where Congress got the power to authorize Mr. Jefferson to lay the embargoes of 1807 and 1808 upon our commerce with all the world, by which he declared rules for its government and under which he terminated commercial relations between this country and all the nations of the earth and brought home the American ships from every sea under the sun?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator sees of course that this is not a general embargo. You are here undertaking to discriminate against individual States and in favor of others.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The power of laying an embargo is the highest possible exercise of the power of quarantine. It is the highest possible exercise of the power to regulate commerce. It is absolute in the Congress of the United States as between our commerce with foreign nations and between the States of the Union. Again, I ask, where did Mr. Jefferson get the power to impose the embargo upon our commerce with all the world, which brought home our Yankee ships to their harbors, where they lay at anchor and rotted and fell down piecemeal in their harbors, and drove the Yankee nation to change their industry from commerce to manufactures, and drove thousands of them to seek homes in the West?

These are questions which I ask the gentlemen of strict construction to answer. They are unanswerable. If you can lay an embargo and stop all commercial intercourse with every nation on the face of earth, you can restrict it, you can regulate it, you can limit it; and if you have that power over foreign commerce, you have under the Constitution of the United States the same power over interstate commerce, the trade between the different States of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Will the Senator permit me to say a word on that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I will say to the Senator that the power exercised by Mr. Jefferson was in pursuance of authority given by Congress as a part of the war power and not a commercial power, and that the question came to the Supreme Court of the United States and the authority of Congress to do it as a war power was affirmed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We were then at war with no nation on earth; we were at peace with all the world, and it was to avenge ourselves against Napoleon and against the government of Great Britain for their impositions upon our own commerce. The war of 1812 grew out of those very embargoes, by which the Democratic party declared that we would nail the colors of the country to the mast of our ships and declare for "free trade and sailors' rights." These are my views upon that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. HARRIS. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, line 1, before "hundred" it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

That the sum of $150,000, to be immediately available, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out, after the word "hundred," the words "and fifty," so as to read: "That the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to be immediately avail, able."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] to the amendment of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, there being on a division ayes 14, noes 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. In section 1, line 7, I move to strike out the words "number, value, and," before the word "condition;" so as to read:

To investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals of the United States.

There is no reason why there should be any census taken of the number and value of the cattle. That would imply a vast deal of labor as well as the expenditure of a great deal of money. Those words were stricken out in the Senate bill by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WILLIAMS. These men can very easily get the number and value of the animals.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It would take a long while. Let them report upon the condition of domestic animals, which is all that is necessary, and not upon their value and number.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state to the Senator that it would be a very easy matter to get the number and value, because all the States have boards of agriculture with those statistics in their possession.

Mr. VAN WYCK. That may be, but you are requiring that to be done here by these officers, by which you would incur a large expenditure. The object is to extirpate the disease among cattle, and all you desire to know is their condition, not their number and value. It is not necessary for this purpose that their number and value should be ascertained.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the Secretary report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas and adopted a few minutes ago in section 3, from line 20 to and including line 23.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the clause as amended.

The Secretary read as follows:

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in such investigations and in such disinfection and quarantine measures as may be necessary to prevent the spread of the disease.

Mr. HARRIS. I move to amend by inserting, after the word "disease," the words "from one State or Territory into another."

The only word I have to say in favor of this amendment is that there is no question about the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States. There is just as little question in my mind about the fact that Congress has no power to regulate it within a single State; and it is for that reason that I offer the amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of theSenator in charge of the bill in reference to the compensation to the employés, not exceeding twenty in number, to be appointed by the Commissioner of Agriculture, as provided in section 1 of the bill. I do not find in my reading of the bill any provision fixing the compensation of those employés. The bill provides that—

The Commissioner of Agriculture is hereby authorized to employ a force sufficient for this purpose, not to exceed twenty persons at any one time.

Mr. PLUMB. There is no provision as to their compensation. This is simply analogous to the provision already existing in a limited way, whereby the Commissioner, when he is required to get special persons, either names the compensation himself and requires them to accept it, or enters into such negotiations as may result in a mutual agreement on the point. As these are not expected to be salaried persons, but to be employed from time to time, you ought either to fix a per diem compensation or leave it to be fixed at the discretion of the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. MORGAN. These are experts, persons supposed to be skilled in veterinary investigations, or otherwise they would be of no service. I thought our recent experience in employing people of this class and professional men ought to caution us that we ought to put some restrictions into the bill. Their compensation ought not to exceed a hundred dollars a day while they are engaged in the prosecution of these diseased cattle, finding out the nature of their diseases, and instituting their coroners' inquests upon cattle. After the word "time," in section 1, line 15, I move to insert:

At a compensation not to exceed $5 a day while employed in the service of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope that will be voted down.

Mr. PLUMB. That would simply render it impossible to employ persons possessing the proper qualifications.

Mr. MORGAN. If that is not enough, let some Senator suggest what will be a sufficient amount. We ought to fix it in this bill. I would suggest also that the Commissioner of Agriculture has the assistance of two agents, in addition to his own skill and his own judgment about such matters, "who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock, whose duty it shall be, under the instructions of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases."

Those agents would naturally be veterinary surgeons, and their compensation is $10 a day. Those he has the right to appoint and keep in office during all seasons and at all times. They are entitled with all necessary expenses to $10 a day "while engaged in the actual performance of their duties under this act." These are agents or officers of the Government. It seems to me that when we give the Commissioner of Agriculture the power to appoint not to exceed twenty additional employés for the same purposes, and men who must have naturally an equal degree of skill, we are not to expect that they shall receive greater compensation than the two special agents who are selected from all the people of the United States to give information upon these very important matters.

I suggested $5 a day. If some Senator thinks that is not enough let him suggest what would be a reasonable compensation; but I insist on its being fixed in the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I ask the Senator from Alabama if he would accept as an amendment the insertion of the words "with his necessary expenses," so as to read "$5 a day, with his necessary expenses."

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; I will accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama modifies his amendment as indicated. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. President, I see no objection to this proposition, and I rather think that the proper persons could be employed to perform this duty at even less price. I am on the side of economy to-day very much. The amendment that has been already adopted here with but one dissenting voice (and that was so weak that I could hardly hear it myself) confines the operation of the bill, the action of the Commissioner of Agriculture, to the prevention of diseased cattle and diseases going from State to State and from Territory to Territory, and of course confines the entire operation of the bill and all expenditure under it to the imaginary lines that divide States. Nobody can examine into the condition of cattle in a State under this measure; nobody under it dare inquire into the diseases and condition of cattle until they are brought across State lines.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator entirely mistakes it. It does not confine it to the imaginary line; it only confines it to cattle that cross the line.

Mr. CONGER. I am coming to that. I could have gotten to it myself, but I am glad of the assistance of the Senator from Massachusetts. I say the bill confines the operations of this proposed law as to inquiring into diseases of cattle and the modes of prevention to the simple fact of the disease, or the cattle appearing with disease, crossing State lines and Territorial lines. It is a beautiful bill. No man dare, if he knows where the State line is, step a rod over into the State on either side to see whether an animal is diseased or not. If he does he is violating this law and exceeding the powers granted and restricted. He is not only violating the Constitution of the United States, but casting discredit upon this august body of Senators and the Congress of the United States.

Now, what is the use of paying men any great amount of money to stand along a State line and keep diseased cattle back from crossing? A ranchero can do that. A cow-boy is the proper agent of this Government to stand along there or to ride his pony along the line. What more is wanted? What is the price paid for rancheros and their day's work and the cow-boys watching herds? They learn the duty of keeping them in some parts of the country from trespassing upon wheat-fields, upon grain, from going over lines, from trespassing upon neighbors' property.

The cow-boy is the man we want to carry out this measure. We do not need the eloquent speech of the Senator from Delaware to show constitutional rights and the dangers of socialism and communism. We do not need that he should bring Herbert Spencer across the Atlantic to instruct us in the best means of preventing the spread of diseases among our cattle. A ranchero is the man we want. Five dollars a day is too much, unless you are going to pay him for the use of a pony and allow him to ride, you might say to ride rough-shod, over State lines; for the only thing that is allowed to go along the State lines is the ranchero to drive back and forward the cattle that are trespassing upon State rights and violating the Constitution and bringing communism and socialism into this country, and permitting Herbert Spencer to spread his views over the land. That is all that is necessary here.

I wonder at any hesitation about adopting without a word this amendment, and I wonder at the hesitation of even Senators, on the other side of the Chamber more especially, hesitating to reduce it to $3 and to $2 or to a dollar and a half. Why should not the great, bold Senators rise to the dignity of the occasion and with economic impulses and economic forces burst forth here in language unmistakable and in language audible, protesting against the employment of men to keep cattle from coming up to a State line? The dignity of a State line might warrant a higher pay, but the necessity of the occasion and the service does not require a higher amount of compensation than $3 a day. We have got down to that in this great thing.

I wonder how the cattle-raisers of the West, the agriculturists of the West, when they have heard and read, as they will—for undoubtedly the Associated Press will carry the remarks of the Senator from Delaware with lightning speed to every point where the telegraph reaches before to-morrow morning—I wonder how the cattle-men of the West, with their millions and millions of cattle, will feel when they see that the Senate has hesitated a moment to reduce the guardians of their property from five dollars a day down to three. They are watching members of this body with an anxious eye just now, and especially these aspirants for the Presidency, to see whether they not only would preserve the Constitution of the United States; but whether they are faithful guardians of the Treasury of the United States. These cattle-men contribute largely to the money placed in the Treasury, and they will call to account every man who votes away an unnecessary dollar or an unnecessary dime in keeping cattle from running over State lines.

Let us be consistent and let us rise to the dignity of this occasion. I would not make the motion to reduce it further, but the economic gentlemen on the other side who are cutting this and all other bills which had some magnitude and some importance before desire the opportunity of showing to the world how economical they are, and I forego the pleasure myself and leave it to them to stand forth as the advocates of economy and the watch-dogs of the Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] as modified.

Mr. PLUMB. Let it be reported.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, line 15, after the word "time," it is proposed to add:

> At a compensation not to exceed $5 per day, with necessary expenses while employed in the service of the Government.

Mr. MORGAN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice that the salaries provided are as follows:

> The salary of the chief of said bureau shall be $3,000 per annum, and the Commissioner shall appoint a clerk for said bureau, with a salary of $1,500 per annum.

Then he shall appoint two competent agents who shall receive $10 a day and expenses while engaged in the service of the Government. The salary that is proposed at $5 a day, not considering the expenses, is at the rate of $1,825 a year. I suppose that inasmuch as the committee had provided nothing in the way of a regulation for the expense of these employés about one-half the money that they propose to pay to the two select commissioners would be a sufficient compensation, and I think so now. I think that after we have fixed that salary we are likely to have a large number of applicants for these places. We shall find competent men enough to practice medicine or to inspect cattle at $5 a day and expenses to put the Republicans, if they should be in power in this body, to a good deal of trouble in picking between their friends as to who shall occupy these places.

I fixed this rate in the hope that some Senator, if he saw proper to raise it and to put it to the test of the Senate, would suggest some higher sum if he thought more was needed or more deserving. So far as I am concerned, that is my best judgment as to what it ought to be, and I have therefore asked that the vote should be taken by yeas and nays so as to get a definite expression from the Senate on that subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MAXEY (when his name was called). During my absence I was paired with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and afterward with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. That pair has been transferred now to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. FAIR], and I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. HAMPTON. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. FARLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. GARLAND], and withdraw my vote. I do not know how he would vote on this amendment. I am paired with him on the passage of the bill, and not knowing how he would vote on this amendment I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CAMDEN. I was requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN] on this question.

Mr. LAPHAM. My colleague [Mr. MILLER] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA].

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Bayard,	Coke,	Harris,	Pendleton,
Brown,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Pugh,
Call,	George,	Maxey,	Ransom,
Camden,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Vance.

NAYS—27.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	McMillan,	Plumb,
Allison,	Harrison,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Sewell,
Cockrell,	Hill,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Williams,
Cullom,	Lapham,	Palmer,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Logan,	Pike,

ABSENT—33.

Anthony,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Garland,	Kenna,	Sherman,
Blair,	Gibson,	Lamar,	Slater,
Bowen,	Gorman,	McPherson,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Groome,	Mahone,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Walker.
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Platt,
Edmunds,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	Jonas,	Sabin,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. On looking over this bill I find this language used frequently in different clauses of it: "Contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases," without reference to whether they are dangerous or destructive to the value of cattle for food or not. That phrase is common in the bill. It occurs in various places. It seems to me that there ought to be some restriction upon that. I find upon looking through a book sent to me by the librarian, on the subject of diseases of cattle, that there are quite a number of infectious and communicable diseases, some of which I suppose are not of a very dangerous character, such as epizootic and other diseases which are included in the description of this bill, but might have possibly no effect on the value of the cattle in the market.

I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that he put in some restrictive words such as "dangerous contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases." It will not do, it seems to me, to enact here that you may put in quarantine all cattle that may have contagious, communicable, or infectious diseases that may not be dangerous to other herds in the sense of destroying their value as property or their usefulness as food. It seems to me the language in the bill is very broad. I prefer to suggest it to the Senator from Kansas to see if he can find some words of restriction to control the subject.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not anticipate such a construction will be put on this bill as the Senator from Alabama seems to anticipate. The language is broad, it is true, but it is impossible to describe all the diseases. They may not have technical names which are common to them everywhere; and therefore it is necessary to use general terms. There is no objection to putting in the word "dangerous," perhaps, so as to read "dangerous contagious, infectious, or communicable diseases." That would add to its value perhaps, but I do not think it would.

I do not anticipate that whoever carries out this bill will carry it out in any different sense from what the Senator from Alabama himself would do, and I do not think it is worth while to be imagining or in any way indulging in the belief that this bill is to be carried out in a way to make its enforcement ridiculous or anything of that kind. Whoever is charged with the responsibility of administering this bill, if it shall become a law, will be just as much desirous of justifying himself in that responsibility as the Senator from Alabama or any member of this body would, and I do not believe, therefore, that any ill will come from it in any way, or that it will be carried out in any way that will not meet with the wishes of the Senator.

Besides, this bill as it stands now provides simply for an authoritative and extensive investigation. It does not commit any power which any one by any strain would call dangerous to the hand of anybody. And what is the reason for limiting the investigation? Why should we not have it as thorough as any one chooses to make it, in order that at some subsequent session of Congress we shall have before us all the information in regard to everything which in any way affects the value of domestic animals? It is true it does not limit them by terms to those diseases which affect the value of the animals, but in the ordinary course of the operations of the law that will be inevitably the case.

Mr. MORGAN. I supposed that the object of this bill was to prevent the spread of disease by the transportation of cattle from place to place that might have communicable diseases, as I presumed all the time of a dangerous character. That was evidently the understanding of the Senate, for we have put in an express provision on the motion of the Senator from Texas that the splenetic or Texas fever shall not be considered a dangerous, infectious, or communicable disease within the meaning of the act. That is a very communicable and very dangerous disease in some phases of it, in some sense of the word, if it is a disease at all.

I therefore thought that inasmuch as we had confined the bill down to an investigation of the diseases of cattle, we would not go into a scientific inquiry into all the diseases with which cattle might be affected which might be communicable or infectious or contagious, unless those diseases were of a dangerous character, and would therefore require some preventive remedy. I do not understand now that the Senate is engaged in a scientific exploration of cattle diseases simply, but we want to find out whether there is something existing in this country or which may exist in this country which will invoke the very extraordinary powers of the Government of the United States in a preventive way to destroy the disease, to prevent its circulation and its communication to other herds of cattle throughout the country.

It seemed to me that there should be something here to qualify the extent of the investigation. We are paying certain men large salaries; we are paying certain other men salaries which the Senate has refused to define at all, allowing the Commissioner of Agriculture to put them at any price he chooses. He can employ as many as twenty experts or twenty cow-boys or twenty agents, and make his own terms with them, and the contract when made of course is obligatory on the Government, and we must pay the sum of money to supply the demand. The business of these men is to investigate diseases. They are to investigate all diseases, not those that are dangerous to herds of cattle, but all diseases of animals. Of course these men will have a broad field of operations throughout the myriads of cattle that roam over the plains of this country. They will be going about from day's end to day's end and year's end to year's end in search of diseases they may find out to be contagious, infectious, or communicable, whether they are light or whether they are heavy and dangerous in their character or not.

It seems to me this is very loose legislation and that the Senator in charge of this bill ought to oblige the Senate by putting the scope of the powers of this investigating board somewhere within range of restriction, and certainly not allow them to go through the country and search for diseases of cattle that may be contagious or communicable or infectious, but after all are not dangerous. I do not think that that was the purpose of the Senate when it started to enact this bill, or of the House when it sent the original bill here.

We have been hearing that the necessity for this bill has been occasioned by the fact that the herds of our country were very much threatened with dangerous diseases, and that our commerce was to be affected abroad by it. And now we have simmered down until we have got to an investigation of all manner of diseases by agents whose service we refuse to price in advance, and they will go about through the country very busy in finding out whether the epizootic exists or a great many other diseases mentioned in this book, some of which are communicable and infectious and others are not. It seems to me that the words ought to be restrained. I therefore move to insert the word "dangerous" before "contagious."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama moves to insert after the word "of" in line 9, section 2, the word "dangerous."

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not think that amounts to anything.

Mr. MORGAN. Then you ought to vote for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will take it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. It has been stated here already that there is a very large power given to the Commissioner in regard to fixing the compensation of the persons to be employed, and as they will all probably have a per diem, the language is used here "with all necessary expenses while engaged in the actual performance of their duty." That is in section 2. I would give them $10 a day, which of course, will be all the working days in the year, three hundred, and they have a precedent for including Sundays also, a precedent in the charges of the star-route counsel. This will include an annual salary of $3,000 a year or more, without any sort of doubt.

Mr. HARRIS, I rise to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will yield to me in order that I may move that the Senate do now adjourn?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think we can get a vote on this bill and do something else to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Probably we may if we stay all night.

Mr. PLUMB. Before we adjourn, if that be the sense of the Senate, I hope we may have an understanding that at some hour to-morrow, to be agreed upon, the bill shall be disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know that the Senator from Nebraska will yield to me.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I trust that a little time will be given for some amendments, without much discussion, to perfect the bill and make it in such a way that in a few months or a year we shall not be called upon to explain why we passed this bill.

Mr. PLUMB. I have no objection to an adjournment or to the Senator from Nebraska having all the opportunity he wants to move amendments, but we ought to have an understanding that the bill shall be acted on to-morrow at some hour, say 4 o'clock or 3 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the proposition of the Senator? Will he state it again?

Mr. PLUMB. I propose that, by unanimous consent, it be agreed that to-morrow at 3 o'clock debate be closed on the bill, and the Senate then proceed to vote on the bill and pending amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent that to-morrow at 3 o'clock debate shall close on the bill and the Senate shall proceed to vote on the then pending amendments and on the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas that very early after this bill was taken up I said that I hoped the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations would bring forward the bill reported by that committee bearing on this subject in reference to our export and import trade. That bill has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and also by the Treasury Department, and I think is a very good measure. I see that the Senator from California is rising in his place, and I hope with a view of offering that as an amendment. Of course if that bill is offered as an amendment, this agreement ought not to be entered into.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If there is to be an adjournment I will propose this amendment with a view of having it printed, that Senators may examine it and determine whether they would like to have it incorporated in this bill or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California offers an amendment as additional sections to the bill. It will be printed. Is there objection to the proposition made by the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I intended to object in consequence of the fact that the Senator from California was offering his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is objection then, and the understanding proposed is not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not think there will be any trouble about my amendment, because if it leads to much discussion the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CONGER. Has the understanding been assented to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was objection, and the understanding was not arrived at. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. FRYE. Before the question is put on that motion, I ask unanimous consent to offer certain amendments to the House bill known as the shipping bill, in order that they may be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendments will be received and printed. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 28, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Journal of Saturday's proceedings was read and approved.

SPANISH FERRY-BOAT NUESTRA SEÑORA DE REGLA.

Mr. POLAND. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for present consideration, Senate bill No. 652, to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla.

Mr. HOLMAN. On Saturday I objected to that bill. I had supposed up to that time that the provision of the statute touching the question of interest on judgments against the United States applied to the judgments rendered in the district court and affirmed by the Supreme Court. But on examination I find that the statute does not apply except to judgments rendered in the Court of Claims. I know, therefore, of no reason why the judgment in this case should not be paid.

Mr. HAMMOND. I stated that in the debate the other morning.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. POLAND moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HOMES FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS.

Mr. ROSECRANS. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs for present consideration a joint resolution to fill vacancies existing in the board of managers of the national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That William B. Franklin of Connecticut, John C. Black of Illinois, and Thomas W. Hyde of Maine be, and are hereby, appointed managers of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to fill vacancies occasioned by the expiration of the terms of office on the 21st day of April, 1884, of William B. Franklin of Connecticut, John M. Palmer of Illinois, and Charles W. Roberts of Maine.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 239) was read three times, and passed.

Mr. ROSECRANS moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ELLIS COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY, KANSAS.

Mr. HANBACK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the House Calendar for consideration at this time the bill (H. R. 578) to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That, by and with the advice and consent of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to sell to the Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas, on such terms as he may designate, a portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, not to exceed one hundred and sixty-five acres in extent, and having such metes and bounds as the Secretary of War may designate.

The Committee on Military Affairs recommend that the bill be amended by adding to it the following:

Provided, That the War Department shall retain entire control of Big Creek and all the timber along its banks on each side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would inquire from what committee the bill comes?

Mr. HANBACK. From the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. HANBACK. It is the unanimous report, and is indorsed by the Secretary of War and the General of the Army.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose there is some report accompanying this bill, and I should be glad to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read, the right to object being reserved.

The report (made by Mr. MORGAN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred bill H. R. 578, submit the following report:

That the bill provides for the sale of a portion of the military reservation at Fort Hays, Kansas, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres, and the metes and bounds to be fixed by the Secretary of War, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas.

There appears to be no objection to the passage of the bill. The same was referred to the War Department for its opinion, and in reply received the following letter, which is made part of this report and is marked Exhibit A.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment providing for the entire control of Big Creek and of the timber on its banks by the War Department.

The following is the amendment of the committee:

"Provided, That the War Department shall retain entire control of Big Creek and all the timber along its banks on each side."

EXHIBIT A.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington City, March 6, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 1st ultimo, stating that you have under consideration, as a subcommittee on Military Affairs, H. R. 578, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, a bill "to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas," and requesting the views of the Department on said bill.

In reply, I beg to inform you that the matter was referred to the commanding officer at Fort Hays, who reports thereon as follows:

"The tract of land within referred to lies wholly on the north side of Big Creek, the post and almost the entire reservation being on the south side, and has been used by the Ellis County Agricultural Society, of Kansas, by authority of the Secretary of War, per letter from the Adjutant-General United States Army, dated Headquarters of the Army, Adjutant-General's Office, Washington, D. C., September 19, 1883, for the purposes of their annual fair.

"It is believed that there can be no objection to disposing of that portion of the reservation to the society named, provided that the bounds be so fixed as to leave to the Government the entire control of the creek at that point, and of the timber on its banks. The tract alluded to is useful for no other purpose, but the restrictions named are considered essential to the interests of the post."

The report of the commanding officer of the post of Fort Hays is approved by the department and division commanders, by Lieutenant-General Sheridan, and also by this Department.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT T. LINCOLN,
Secretary of War.

Hon. CHARLES H. MORGAN,
Of the Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no doubt it is entirely proper that this public object shall be accomplished by the sale of this property. But this purports to be a private sale, and there is no intimation that there shall be an appraisement of the property. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HANBACK] that the bill be amended by inserting a provision requiring this property to be sold at not less than the appraised value, to be ascertained in the usual manner in such cases.

Mr. HANBACK. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will reduce his amendment to writing. The first question will be upon the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The amendment reported from the committee was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to amend by inserting the words "for not less than the appraised value thereof, such value to be ascertained as in other cases of the sale of lands subject to appraisement."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then order to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HANBACK moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

STATUE OF CHIEF-JUSTICE MARSHALL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table, for consideration at this time, Senate joint resolution No. 80, relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall. It is important that this resolution should be passed at once, as the time is short and some preparations have got to be made.

Mr. TALBOTT. The day fixed in that resolution for the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall is the same day that was fixed by order of the House for the consideration of bills from the Committee on Naval Affairs, the 10th of May. I shall have no objection to the consideration of this joint resolution, provided the House will consent to change the day for the consideration of naval business to the 24th of May instead of the 10th, there being no special assignment for the 24th. If that is agreed to, I will not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the order for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs be read.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution of the Senate will be read, after which the Chair will direct the Clerk to read the order of the House in relation to business from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The joint resolution of the Senate was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the two Houses will attend the ceremony of unveiling the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall, on Saturday the 10th day of May, 1884, at 1 o'clock p. m.

That the Joint Committee on the Library are authorized to make all necessary arrangements for such ceremonial, and that the sum of $1,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to defray the expense thereof, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, and disbursed on the order of said committee.

BUSINESS FROM COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now report the order of the House concerning the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Clerk read the following resolution:

Resolved, That the session of Saturday, May 10, after the morning hour, be devoted to the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, and bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table over which said committee has jurisdiction, except bills providing for the construction of additional war vessels; the bills and resolutions to be considered in the order agreed upon by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] asks consent to change the date for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs from the 10th of May to the 24th of May.

Mr. COBB. I must object.

Mr. TALBOTT. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. COBB. I intend to object to any more special orders.

Mr. TALBOTT. This is a special order already made.

Mr. COBB. But you want to change the date of it.

Mr. TALBOTT. Because the day which was assigned to this special order is taken for the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall.

Mr. COBB. If that is the case, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. TALBOTT. The day fixed for the unveiling of the statue was fixed by the Senate since the special order was made by the House.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate order for the unveiling of the statue should prevail, whether the other does or not.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the day fixed by the special order of the House for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs will be changed from May 10 to May 24.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

UNVEILING OF STATUE OF CHIEF-JUSTICE MARSHALL.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate joint resolution which has been read? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read three several times, and passed.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAPT. WILLIAM H. GILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 3557) for the relief of Capt. William H. Gill, and that the bill be now taken up for consideration.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the right of objection may be reserved until the gentleman from Pennsylvania can explain the object of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. The object is simply to make consistent with the act of 1882 the longevity record of Captain Gill. The act gives him his grade and rank, but does not give him credit for his anterior service. The report of the Committee on Military Affairs makes this statement:

The bill (H. R. 3557) gives no pay to Captain Gill for the time he was out of the service, but simply provides that his "longevity record" shall be made consistent with the "grade and rank" conferred by the act of March 4, 1882, restoring him to the Army.

The bill simply enforces the intent of the act of Congress which gave Captain Gill the same grade and rank he held at the time of his resignation.

The bill carries with it no pay at all. Captain Gill is to-day the ranking officer of his corps, but is the junior in longevity record.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I must object to the passage of bills of this kind by unanimous consent. I call for the regular order.

INDEX OF PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts. That committee has directed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to continue the preparation of a digested summary and alphabetical list of the private claims presented to the House of Representatives, so as to include the unfinished portion of the Forty-seventh Congress and the Forty-eighth Congress; and the expense of performing the said work shall, under the direction of the Committee on Accounts, be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume that we are not all of us informed as to how these payments are made.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I can inform the gentleman. The compensation is a per diem—the same paid to all per diem clerks, $6 a day.

Mr. HOLMAN. How many persons are or have been heretofore employed in this work?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. In former Congresses the number has been as high as six; but I do not think more than three will be required.

Mr. RANDALL. Then let us say three.

A MEMBER. What is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. The resolution provides for continuing the preparation of an alphabetical list of private claims. The manuscript for the Forty-seventh Congress has been prepared and is awaiting publication until the completion of the list for the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is very important to have this list completed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will include in the resolution a provision that no more than three persons shall be employed.

Mr. ERMENTROUT. I agree to that proviso, as I think it will include all the necessary labor. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

Provided, That not exceeding three persons shall be employed in said work.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. ERMENTROUT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I think now we had better have the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded. The report just considered was a privileged report.

DISTRIBUTION OF JOURNALS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. SMITH. I send to the desk for present consideration a report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SMITH] presents, as the Chair understands, a privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to distribute the surplus copies of the Journals of the two Houses of Congress in his charge among such public, college, and law libraries as have not already been supplied with the same.

Mr. SMITH. I ask that the report accompanying this resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. This is not a privileged report. It does not relate to printing for the use of the two Houses, but merely to the distribution of documents. The regular order has been demanded by several gentlemen.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ACADEMY OF SCIENCES.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman has a privileged report it is in order.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York. The committee have directed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the report of the National Academy of Sciences, with its appendices, be printed in the usual octavo form, but that the four accompanying memoirs be printed in quarto form; and that 1,000 additional copies of the report and memoirs be printed for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 1,500 copies for the use of the Academy of Sciences.

The report accompanying the resolution was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred Senate concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of the report of the Academy of Sciences, together with additional copies of the same, submit the following report, and recommend the passage of the resolution:

The act incorporating the National Academy of Sciences, March 3, 1863, provides that it shall report its proceedings and investigations to Congress, and free of charge. These reports are always printed. The report in question contains two memoirs of great public value, which have been prepared at the request of Congress.

While these memoirs and other features of the report merits general circulation, the committee is of the opinion that an additional number should be printed for the use of members of the academy who receive no compensation for their services to the Government. The committee therefore recommend the printing of the additional copies provided for in the Senate resolution.

The estimated cost is $1,937.90 for the usual number, and $541 for each additional thousand.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. ROGERS, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF EULOGIES.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask by unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce a joint resolution for the printing of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, deceased.

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been demanded and the Chair can not ask unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. HERBERT. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio who made the demand for the regular order to withdraw it until I can submit the usual resolution for the printing of these eulogies.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I withdraw my demand for that purpose, although it is a bad precedent to withdraw demands for the regular order when once made, but this is an exceptional case.

Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas H. Herndon, a Representative-elect to the Forty-eighth Congress from the State of Alabama 12,500 copies, of which 3,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 9,500 for the use of the House of Representatives. And the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to have printed a portrait of the said Thomas H. Herndon, to accompany said eulogies, and for the purpose of engraving or printing said portrait the sum of $500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HERBERT moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENERAL ASSEMBLY, January Session, A. D. 1884.

[House joint resolution No. 187.]

Whereas believing that the education of Indians and their voluntary citizenship in the United States will most justly, quickly, and economically solve the Indian problem: Therefore,

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to aid in the passage of resolutions solemnly pledging the faith of the nation to the Indian policy embodied in the following principles:

First. That the unpaid sum pledged for educational purposes by the Government as part payment for the cession of lands by Indians be appropriated for the purchase of stock, farming implements, tools, &c., for Indian manual-labor schools.

Second. That so much of the net proceeds of the sale of public lands as may be necessary shall be set apart for the purpose of creating a permanent fund for education of Indians.

Third. That lands in severalty, making their titles inalienable for twenty-five years, and United States citizenship may be granted at once to all Indians who so desire.

Fourth. That the legal personality of all Indians may be granted, and that protection of law may be given them as it is to all other races within these United States.

Fifth. That the civilization of Indians may be hastened by providing for and rewarding their civilized industries.

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State.

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report of the Secretary of State in relation to the bill for the support of the diplomatic and consular services.

CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, April 28, 1884.

The SPEAKER. This message, with the accompanying documents, will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the documents be referred and the committee empowered to order the printing if they should deem it necessary.

Mr. KEIFER. I believe it is usual for the House to order the printing of all communications of this kind.

Mr. RANDALL. If any considerable number of members of the committee desire the printing, of course it will be done; but I think it would be best to leave the printing discretionary with the committee.

Mr. KEIFER. If there is any question as to the propriety of printing the document, I make no objection to the course proposed.

The SPEAKER. The message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with discretion on the part of the committee to have them printed if it be deemed necessary.

THE COTTON CENTENNIAL EXPOSITION.

Mr. ELLIS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 6679, a bill (H. R. 6856) to provide for the celebration of the World's Industrial and Cotton Centennial Exposition; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

D. H. DENNY.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6858) granting a pension to D. H. Denny; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House this day is set apart for the consideration of such bills as may be called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MULDROW. The unfinished business in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, District of Columbia. The bill had been discussed, but no final action had been reached. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from its further consideration. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to do that with a view to the recommittal of the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. The status of the matter is this: Tellers were ordered and there was no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Mississippi can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is what I supposed.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bridge bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I desire, Mr. Speaker, to be recognized on a matter of personal privilege.

Mr. MULDROW. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MULDROW. Is that permissible at this stage of the proceedings?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows no reason why it is not if it is a question of personal privilege. The Chair has not heard the statement of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MULDROW. I thought I had the floor to submit a request, which was objected to.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I waited until the gentleman had finished his request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's request was submitted to the House and objected to, whereupon the gentleman from New York was recognized on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last, during the debate on the amendment to the naval appropriation bill, I made a statement that the Secretary of the Navy had not complied with the law. This statement was controverted, and I have since been subjected, I am told, to very considerable criticism where the facts are either perverted or not fully understood.

I ask the Clerk to read a short passage from the act of March 3, 1883.

The Clerk read as follows:

Any vessel sold under the foregoing provisions shall be delivered to the purchaser upon the full payment to the Secretary of the Navy of the amount of such proposal or offer, and the net proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury. But no vessel of the Navy shall hereafter be sold in any other manner than herein provided, or for less than such appraised value, unless the President of the United States shall otherwise direct in writing. In case any vessel now in process of construction in any navy-yard has been or shall be found to be unworthy of being completed, and has been and shall be condemned under the provisions of said act, and can not properly be sold, and it becomes necessary to remove the same, the cost of such removal shall be paid out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of other vessels hereby authorized to be sold.

Mr. CALKINS. May I ask the gentleman what that act is?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. It is the act of March 3, 1883.

Mr. CALKINS. What has been read is not in the act before me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. What the Clerk read was from the statutes.

Mr. CALKINS. That is not the language under which the sales took place.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The sales were made under the act of March 3, 1883, as the gentleman will find by referring to the report.

Mr. CALKINS. I agree they were sold under the act of March 3, 1883, but the act as read is not like the one I have before me.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Clerk read it from the statute-book. It can be read again.

Mr. CALKINS. I only call the gentleman's attention to the fact I have stated.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman is mistaken. The Secretary reports under that act he sold vessels to the amount of $384,753. The act directed that money to be covered into the Treasury.

I now ask to have read a statement from the Treasurer of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, April 25, 1884.

There was deposited by the Secretary of the Navy to the credit of his special account on the books of this office in September, October, and November, 1883, $312,716.05, from which there was checked out at sundry times $240,225.89, of which $200,000 was deposited in general Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, sale of old vessels under section 5, act of March 3, 1883, leaving to the credit of special account $72,490.16. In addition there was deposited by the Secretary of the Navy with the assistant treasurer at San Francisco on November 30, 1883, to the credit of Hon. William E. Chandler, Secretary of the Navy, $46,287, which amount still remains on deposit according to the latest report of the assistant treasurer. The deposit in general Treasury of $200,000 was made April 18, 1884.

A. U. WYMAN,
Treasurer United States.

Furnished at request of Hon. A. S. HEWITT.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Now, Mr. Speaker, in reply to my statement that this money had not been covered into the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy sent to this House a dispatch, which I will send to the Clerk's desk, also to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., April 24, 1884.

To Hon. W. H. CALKINS:

The proceeds of sales of old vessels, amounting to $384,753, as appears by my report, page 19, were immediately deposited in the Treasury of the United States and have there remained, except that drafts have been for advertising and expenses of sale.

W. E. CHANDLER,
Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CALKINS. There was also an addendum to that dispatch, which will be found on the next page.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I will ask to have it read also, as I want the whole statement of the Secretary to appear.

Mr. CALKINS. The addendum relates to the expense of selling and of taking to pieces the two old vessels. It will be found on page 3656 of the RECORD.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RANDALL. I now move that the committee rise and report its action to the House.

Mr. CALKINS. Before that is done I desire to state that there were some words omitted from the dispatch from the Secretary of the Navy which I had read when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] was addressing the committee. With those words added, the dispatch will read as follows:

"The proceeds of the sales of old vessels, amounting to $384,753, as appears by my report, page 19, were immediately deposited in the Treasury of the United States, and have there remained, except that drafts have been * * * for advertising and expenses of sale, and expenses of taking to pieces two old vessels on the stocks, as allowed by law."

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Those expenses are certified to in the document from which I read. They amount to about $37,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is to be observed that the law requires the net proceeds arising from the sales of these vessels to be covered into the Treasury of the United States. The Treasurer says that they were not covered into the Treasury, but were deposited with him to the credit of the Secretary of the Navy and subject to his checks.

When money is covered into the Treasury of the United States it can only be taken out by act of Congress. That was the evident intention of the law which has been read from the desk. The Secretary of the Navy, instead of putting the net proceeds from these sales into the Treasury, as required by the law, where he could not get it out except by appropriations made through Congress, saw fit to deposit it with the Treasurer of the United States to his own credit, where it was subject to his individual draft, and, as the Treasurer tells me, he could have taken the whole amount out at any time on his mere check without a voucher of any kind whatever. Now, the Secretary exercised a wise discretion for which I commend him in depositing this money with the Treasurer of the United States rather than with a private bank; but it was not in the Treasury in the sense which the law intended, where it could not be subject to his check or his draft. On the contrary, he put it where it was subject to his check and his draft, which the law forbids.

It will be remembered that complaint was made of me that I did not find out when I made my statement on the floor that this money had been placed with the Treasurer. I will acknowledge that I was somewhat humbled when the gentleman from Illinois brought to my knowledge the fact that in the appendix to the report of the Secretary, and which appendix I had not then seen, there was a statement that the money had been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States.

I have been reproached with not having taken sufficient care to get at this fact. I went to every officer of the Treasury that had the accounts of money covered into the Treasury of the United States, and each one told me that it had not been covered into the Treasury. I did not go to the Treasurer for the simple reason that he does not keep these accounts; but I did go immediately after the debate in the House the other day, and I was informed that the money had been deposited by him as stated, but that it was the first occasion so far as he knew, and so far as the clerks in the Department knew, in which any money had ever been deposited with the Treasurer of the United States to the credit of the Secretary of the Navy. Therefore if I was in fault gentlemen will be a little merciful, because if I did not go immediately to the Treasurer of the United States to ask this information it was owing to the fact in the first place that it was not the proper place for the deposit of the money, and, secondly, because no man would have deemed it necessary to go there for the information since such a deposit had never been made before.

Again, in regard to the amount of money, about $500,000 is the joint receipts from the sales of the vessels and of the stores. The whole of this money has been in some way or somehow subject to the control of the Secretary of the Navy. On the 19th day of April, six days before I made the statement in this House, and three or four weeks after making the inquiry, the sum of $200,000 is directed to be covered into the Treasury of the United States; that is to say, one week ago. The money had been lying there for six months without interest, and as I believe in violation of the obligation of the law. But suddenly $200,000 of this money is directed to be covered into the Treasury of the United States, which is a practical admission that the money has not been in the right place. Upon receiving that information I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States asking him whether any money had yet been covered into the Treasury of the United States as the proceeds from the sales of the vessels or of the stores, and I ask now to have the letter of the Secretary read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 25, 1884.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this date asking to be informed whether any money has been covered into the Treasury since June 30, 1883, by the Secretary of the Navy, as proceeds of sales, giving dates, and amounts so covered into the Treasury.

In reply you are informed that there does not appear to have been any amount technically "covered into" the Treasury by warrant in the name of the Secretary of the Navy on account of sales during the period mentioned, but the records show that there was deposited with the United States assistant treasurer at San Francisco, Cal., to the official credit of the Secretary of the Navy during the period ended November 30, 1883 the sum of $46,287. This amount remained unchanged April 12, 1884, the date of the last return received from San Francisco.

During the month of October, 1883, four deposits were made with the Treasurer of the United States, Washington, D. C., to the official credit of the Secretary of the Navy, aggregating the sum of $277,000, and during the period from April 12 to April 19, 1884, the balance was reduced $200,000.

This latter amount was deposited to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, and is now in process of being covered into the Treasury, but the warrant is not yet issued.

Very respectfully,

CHAS. T. FOLGER, Secretary.

Hon. ABRAM S. HEWITT,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. So it appears that up to the present moment not one dollar of this fund is actually covered into the Treasury, but $200,000 of it on Saturday last was "in process" of being covered into the Treasury of the United States. Now, I charged that the law had not been complied with; that all the money derived from the sales of the vessels, the net proceeds, should have been covered into the Treasury. As a reason why this was not done gentlemen point to a subsequent clause of the law which says that certain vessels were to be broken up and the expense of breaking them up was to be deducted from the net proceeds of the sales of vessels. There is such a provision, I agree, and the construction, it seems to me, is perfectly plain. The net proceeds of the sales of vessels, less the expense of the sales, was to be covered into the Treasury, not deposited with the Treasurer subject to the check of the Secretary of the Navy. But when the vessels were broken up then there was authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to withdraw from the funds so covered into the Treasury the expense of breaking up these vessels, and that was to be done under the law, by a Treasury warrant, and can be done in no other manner. The authority to apply the money is contained in the words at the close of the section, "the cost of such removal shall be paid out of the net proceeds derived from the sale of other vessels hereby authorized by law." This can not mean the money which remains after the cost of breaking up vessels is paid, but it must mean the "net proceeds" of the vessels which were positively ordered to be covered into the Treasury. In other words, it is the Secretary of the Treasury and not the Secretary of the Navy who is to supply the money for breaking up the vessels.

Therefore I think the Secretary of the Navy is mistaken in his view of the law. The law says the net proceeds shall be covered into the Treasury. And that means the moment the net proceeds of the sales of the vessels are known those net proceeds are not subject to any deduction for breaking up ships. Those net proceeds tell their own story. It is what the ships produce; it is that which is to go into the Treasury. And then there is to come out of the Treasury, chargeable to this fund so covered into the Treasury, the money necessary to pay the cost of breaking up the vessels.

This I understand to be the law. But whether it be the law or not, I imputed then and impute now no intention on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to do any dishonest or dishonorable thing. On the contrary, I expressly disclaimed it. And now I wish to say further, that so far as I have observed the administration of the Secretary of the Navy in his Department it has been most creditable. I believe the whole tone of the service has been raised.

But that is not the issue in this case. The issue is whether he, a great officer of the Government, has obeyed the clear command of the law. I criticised what I believed to be his disobedience of it. I criticise it still. I do not make the hypercritical comments which I might make on the fact that his dispatch is apparently misleading when he says "deposited in the Treasury," instead of saying "deposited with the Treasurer of the United States." In the one case, if actually done, it was not subject to his check; in the other it was. I will not criticise the fact that part of the money is deposited in San Francisco instead of in Washington. Those are slight errors. I do not criticise the fact that the amount was misstated to be $384,000, and also misstated by his clerk to be $384,000. I do not criticise the fact that one of the vessels was not paid for and that really the amount is $29,000 less. When the Secretary sent his dispatch here he did not seem to know the fact that he never had had the $29,000. All that is consistent with rectitude of purpose and action. What I complain of is that he kept this fund under his own personal control.

As to the Secretary's motives I do not impugn them. I simply deal with the facts as I find them. It is the duty of members of Congress to watch closely the mode of handling the public funds. I deal with the fact that he kept this large sum of money subject to his control when the law required it to be placed beyond his control. If he could have put $200,000 one week ago into the Treasury he might have done it six months ago, for there was no possibility that this large sum of money could be required even for the purposes he claimed he had a right to retain it for. If he had a right to retain it for six months he had a right to retain it for six years, till the last of these rotten old vessels that can not be sold shall be broken to pieces.

I repeat that could not be the intention of the law. But if the Secretary thought it was the intention of the law I cheerfully acquit him of all purpose to violate it. Nevertheless it was violated according to the best construction I can put on it, and according to the opinion of competent lawyers whom I have consulted.

Mr. CALKINS addressed the Chair.

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to inquire of the Chair how long this discussion is to run?

Mr. CALKINS. Not long on my part.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will be heard.

Mr. MULDROW. Do I understand the gentleman from Indiana claims to speak as a matter of right?

Mr. CALKINS. Yes, sir; as a matter of right, as a matter of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has not yet stated his purpose. The Chair supposed he rose to make a statement as to the matter on which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] has spoken.

Mr. CALKINS. I rise to a question of privilege. But before proceeding I desire to call the attention of the House to three consecutive charges which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] made against the Secretary of the Navy. In his first speech relating to this matter on Thursday last—I read from the RECORD—speaking of this money, he said:

I went through bureau after bureau and no trace of it could be discovered. By the terms of the sale that money was payable to the Secretary in thirty days after the day of sale, which was on the 21st September last. I ascertained that the money had been paid, and yet up to within three weeks—for I believe that covers the time the bill was under consideration—up to within three weeks the money had not reached the Treasury of the United States.

That was the charge; not that the money had not been covered into the Treasury, as the gentleman erroneously states now, but that it had not reached the Treasury.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to say, whatever I may have said, whether the language there is sufficient to express my meaning or not, I was following the law and meant covered into the Treasury; and I subsequently stated so.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman is as much mistaken in his explanation of the law as he was in the use of his language.

Mr. HAMMOND. Let the gentleman from Indiana read the preceding sentence.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from New York is as much mistaken in his supplementary explanation as to what the law is as he is as to what he said. He went on to say:

Now, I make no charge whatever of improper use of that money. I do not believe the Secretary of the Navy would misappropriate one dollar of it; but this I say, that if he kept that money in the hands of some subordinate agent in the city of New York or the city of Boston or some other place, $500,000 in money which ought to have been in the Treasury of the United States, he neglected his duty.

The charge was that it had not reached the Treasury, and consequently, by innuendo, it was in some other place. But what is the next charge?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me right there——

Mr. CALKINS. One moment. When I have got through reading I will listen to the gentleman. What is the next charge made by the gentleman?

I found after very thorough inquiry that $50,000 had been received from the navy agent or purchasing agent, or whatever he may be called, in the city of New York, on an open check, and the officer in charge of the bureau was unable to say on what account it came except it came to the credit of the Navy Department, and there it was, an open warrant waiting some explanation from somebody.

After being interrupted then by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELFORD] the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] went on to say:

All I say is I will not trust a public officer to spend money who retains public funds in his custody which by virtue of law should be in the Treasury. I do not know what use, if any, may have been made of it; but I know this, there is no obligation on him to pay it into the Treasury until after the next election, unless he does it under obligation of the law, which he has not respected so far as I could get any information at the Treasury Department.

The second charge by way of innuendo is that, this money not being "in the Treasury," there was no obligation on the part of the Secretary of the Navy to pay it into the Treasury until after the next election. It was not "in the Treasury" because it was to be retained until after the next election. That is charge No. 2. The last charge is this:

I did not know this debate was coming up or I would have gone to the Treasury to see whether the money is there now. It may be there now for aught I know. If not it is in somebody's custody, possibly drawing interest which does not inure to the benefit of the United States.

That is charge No. 3. Now I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. When the gentleman began to read from my remarks he began to read from the third paragraph. Now if he will kindly read the second paragraph, or allow me to read it, it will probably clear up the meaning of the words "in the Treasury" as I used them in what I said. Will the gentleman allow me to read it?

Mr. CALKINS. I have no objection to the gentleman reading it right now. I have put before the House the three charges the gentleman made. As to the question about "covering into the Treasury" I will speak in a moment.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman will do me the justice to let me read it now——

Mr. CALKINS. I would prefer that the gentleman should read it in his own time, and not now.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But the gentleman has read only portions of my remarks.

Mr. CALKINS. I read all of the three charges made by the gentleman against the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. If the gentleman will not do me the simple justice to allow me to explain——

Mr. CALKINS. I would not do injustice to any man in the world. If the gentleman has anything to read that will throw light upon the three charges which he made and which I have read from his speech, he may read it now. I think it will throw no light upon them at all; I know what it is.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. This is what I said:

Under a subsequent act passed March 3, 1883, giving similar authority as to vessels, he proceeded to have appraised and condemned a large number of vessels which were sold in September last and produced according to his annual report something over $300,000, which, added to the sales of condemned stores, made a total of nearly $500,000, which he was bound by law to cover into the Treasury.

That was the charge which I made against him, that he did not "cover it into the Treasury."

Mr. CALKINS. Very well. I have stated before that the gentleman made the charges which I have specifically pointed out to the House. I have allowed him to supplement what he then said in those charges by reading another portion of his speech in which he was talking of what the law requires. Now I will come immediately to the law, and I will show that the gentleman, not being a lawyer, is as much out of the true line in that statement as he was in making the statement upon the floor on Thursday last which I have just read. I will read now section 5 of the act of March 3, 1883, under which these vessels were sold, and I will read all the sections:

It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy to cause to be appraised, in such manner as may seem best, all vessels of the Navy which have been stricken from the Navy Register under the provisions of the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes, approved August 5, 1882. And if the said Secretary shall deem it for the best interest of the United States to sell any such vessel or vessels, he shall, after such appraisal, advertise for sealed proposals for the purchase of the same, for a period not less than three months, in such newspapers as other naval advertisements are published, setting forth the name and location and the appraised value of such vessel, and that the same will be sold, for cash, to the person or persons or corporation or corporations offering the highest price therefor above the appraised value thereof; and such proposals shall be opened on a day and hour and at a place named in said advertisement, and record thereof shall be made. The Secretary of the Navy shall require to accompany each bid or proposal a deposit in cash of not less than 10 per cent. of the amount of the offer or proposal, and also a bond, with two or more sureties, to be approved by him, conditioned for the payment of the remaining 90 per cent. of the amount of such offer or proposal within the time fixed in the advertisement. And in case default is made in the payment of the remaining 90 per cent., or any part thereof, the Secretary, within the prescribed time thereof, shall advertise and resell said vessel under the provisions of this act. And in that event said cash deposit of 10 per cent. shall be considered as forfeited to the Government, and shall be applied, first, to the payment of all costs and expenditures attending the advertisement and resale of said vessel; second, to the payment of the difference, if any, between the first and last sale of said vessel; and the balance, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury.

That is it, "the balance, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury."

Mr. HEWITT of New York. That is the case of a vessel not sold and which is to be resold. Now, will the gentleman read on as to the others?

Mr. CALKINS. The terms of the provision——

Mr. HEWITT of New York. Will the gentleman read on?

Mr. CALKINS. The terms of the provision for covering the money into the Treasury apply to the whole fund. You can not limit the provision to those vessels which are resold. I construe the law to reach the whole fund, and the whole expenditure under the law.

Mr. HEWITT of New York. Will the gentleman read the rest of the clause?

Mr. CALKINS. Certainly.

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent a suit upon said bond for breach of any of its conditions. Any vessel sold under the foregoing provisions shall be delivered to the purchaser upon the full payment to the Secretary of the Navy of the amount of such proposal or offer, and the net proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is it. As each vessel is sold the net proceeds are to be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. CALKINS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman and I can not indulge in any play upon words. The law requires that "the net proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury." The net proceeds of what?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Of the sale of the vessel.

Mr. CALKINS. And the net proceeds are the amount remaining after the payment of all expenses?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALKINS. Now I will show the gentleman before I get through that the Secretary of the Navy had not done paying the expenses in connection with the sales of these vessels——

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. And never will be.

Mr. CALKINS. And he could not, therefore, turn the money into the Treasury. Now, how could the Secretary cover the proceeds of the sale of a vessel into the Treasury until he had paid the expenses of the sale? The gentleman says he never will be done paying these expenses. That is on a par with the extravagant statements which the gentleman has frequently made on this floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Then I take it back, and say "may never be paid."

Mr. CALKINS. The act continues:

But no vessel of the Navy shall hereafter be sold, &c.

I need not read further, because I have read all that refers to the disposition of the proceeds of these sales.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to the manner of executing that law; and the gentleman could have found out the facts by inquiring at the Navy Department of the bureau officers who have had these sales in charge. What is the fact? Advertisements were published, appraisements were made, the proposals were sent in, and when the bids were opened parties who submitted those bids came forward, some with drafts, some with checks, some with money. The officer in charge of the matter—because the Secretary of the Navy simply directed the proceedings—took these drafts or checks or money constituting the 10 per cent. advance, and sent them from his office directly over to the Treasury, where they were deposited as the law requires. He could not cover the money into the Treasury until the net proceeds had been ascertained.

What next did he do? Then the sale of these vessels took place. As fast as the money was paid (and this the gentleman could have found out if he had made inquiry) the money was carried right over to the Treasury Department, and there deposited to the credit of the Secretary of the Navy on special account. Why? Because if the money had been covered into the Treasury an act of Congress would have been required to get it out in order to pay the expenses. But the money being deposited to his account, the Secretary of the Navy could check against it, provided he presented a voucher within the law which would pass the auditing officer, not otherwise; and the gentleman knows it. After money has been deposited on the public account it can not pass the auditing officer until a sufficient voucher is presented showing that the expenditure is for a purpose within the law. Now, what did the Secretary of the Navy do? He had the right to deposit this money anywhere.

Mr. MULDROW rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr CALKINS] will suspend his remarks. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] rises, as the Chair understands, to a question of order, which he will state.

Mr. MULDROW. I have no desire to interrupt this debate except for the reason that this is a day set apart for the consideration of business from the Committee on the District of Columbia; and I make the point of order that the discussion now proceeding does not present a privileged question which has the right to consume the time appropriated to business of the District of Columbia.

Mr. CALKINS. I submit that if there has been, as charged by the gentleman from New York, a violation of the law on the part of an officer of this Government, it is a little ungracious that the explanation should not be allowed to accompany the charge. I trust, therefore, my friend from Mississippi will withdraw his point and let me go on for a few moments.

Mr. MULDROW. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. CALKINS. I can not indicate exactly—not more than ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. MULDROW. I withdraw my objection, so that the gentleman may proceed ten or fifteen minutes longer.

Mr. CALKINS. Thanks. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the gentleman from New York made three specific charges, which he has come back this morning and modified by saying, first, that he intended to say the money was not covered into the Treasury as provided by law. I submit to the judgment of any gentleman in this House whether that law requires that the money be covered into the Treasury until the net proceeds are ascertained.

But what did the Secretary of the Navy do? I make this statement for the Secretary: that without any knowledge that there was any gentleman pursuing him through the Treasury Department, without any knowledge that inquiry had been made on the subject, rather than have so large a fund standing to his special credit, he voluntarily covered $200,000 of the money into the Treasury on April 18, 1884, and before these accounts were closed, leaving to his credit a sufficient sum to draw against to pay the expenditures which the law contemplates shall be paid out of these proceeds. Now, what is the fact? The sales of these vessels amounted to a gross sum, as the Secretary stated in his report, of $383,000 in round numbers. It is true that by mistake on the part of the Navy Department, or some person connected with it, the sale of the ship Niagara had to be canceled because it was advertised to be sold with boilers and engines in the vessel. It turned out they were not in the vessel, and the Secretary could not retain the 10 per cent. of the amount bid and it had to be paid back when the sale was canceled. That comes out of the sum reported by the Secretary, because, as I have said, the contract has since been canceled and the vessel is unsold.

What is the next fact? The amount of money deposited, as shown by the letter the gentleman had read from the Treasurer, a substantial copy of which I have in my hand, shows the Secretary of the Treasury and the telegram of the Secretary of the Navy of last Thursday exactly agree. The sum deposited in the subtreasury at San Francisco (the place where a part of these vessels were, and they had to be sold by the officers there and the proceeds deposited in the subtreasury there), added to the amount deposited in the Treasury here, make up the exact sum the vessels sold for.

What is the next step? The gentleman again by insinuation said the material sold, amounting to $138,000 in round numbers, has not been accounted for by the Secretary in this statement. Does not the gentleman from New York know the Secretary of the Navy has no personal contact with that at all? These materials are sold at the different yards by the commandants of the different yards, and the money is paid to the different paymasters in those yards, and these reports of sales are made to the Secretary of the Navy in the ordinary course of business from these yards. Not a dollar of that money ever comes into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy at all. These paymasters settle directly as disbursing officers with the Treasury Department.

Am I right in that? Yes; section 3622, Revised Statutes, will give the gentleman proper information on that subject. And if he had taken pains to look up the law—as much pains to look up the law as he has to form charges against the officers of the Government—he would have been spared the mortification of making indirect charges against the Secretary on this account, which are so easily shown to be without foundation. I have given, Mr. Speaker, the exact history of this transaction. I will not go specifically into detail. I have the details here as to the sales of this old material; $71,386 is the amount which actually so far has been placed in the Treasury by the different officers of the different yards. The balance is in their hands, but will be covered into the Treasury before the beginning of the next fiscal year, as is the custom of the Departments, and will be accounted for after paying out the expenses of the sales under the law.

I have the specific amounts here, which any gentleman may get by calling on the auditor; but I will not take up the time of the House to read them.

Now, the gentleman charges that the Secretary of the Navy violated the law because he did not cover this money into the Treasury within six months after the sale. The fact is, this money was not paid six months ago. The longest time was five months ago. The Secretary of the Navy had deposited this money in the Treasury at the time it was received, which was not a violation of law, but exactly within the terms of the law.

The gentleman's next charge is that this is the first time an officer has ever deposited money to his special credit.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I said the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CALKINS. This is the first law so far as I know or am informed that ever authorized the Secretary of the Navy to do it. The other laws have been general, declaring that the gross amount should be covered into the Treasury and reported to Congress to make appropriations for the necessary expenses.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I said any account, gross or net.

Mr. CALKINS. This is the only law ever authorizing the Secretary of the Navy so to do that I know of, and he pursued the exact course provided.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Did not the law say "cover into the Treasury?"

Mr. CALKINS. Oh, yes; the net proceeds, whenever those are ascertained, and, as I have said before, the net proceeds are not ascertained until the expenses have been paid and deducted from the gross proceeds.

Mr. BELFORD. What does it cost to break these vessels up?

Mr. CALKINS. There remain the Colossus, Massachusetts, the Oregon, the Pennsylvania, the Java, and Virginia yet to be broken up. It cost to break up the two vessels already broken up about $30,000. I do not expect to give the exact sum, but the two vessels already broken up cost about that sum. There yet remain six vessels to be broken up. What is the further fact? After a vessel is broken up the material is sold and the Government receives the net amount after deducting expenses. That is why this money is yet to the credit of the Secretary of the Navy; and the reason is apparent to any man who will consider the matter, that if it were covered into the Treasury it would require an appropriation from Congress to get it out and apply it to these expenditures.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Let me ask the gentleman, if he, as a lawyer—for I do not claim to be one—will say that under the law as it now stands, and the proceeds had been paid in, the Secretary of the Treasury would not be authorized to pay it out again on account of the necessary expenses attending the carrying into execution of the law?

Mr. CALKINS. Not without a special act of Congress, if I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I ask the gentleman if the law is not sufficiently broad as it is to authorize such payments?

Mr. CALKINS. It is not.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. That is your judgment as a lawyer?

Mr. CALKINS. That is my judgment as a lawyer, and I am willing to submit it to the judgment of every lawyer on this floor.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have been advised by lawyers that it was a plain proposition, and that he would have that right.

Mr. CALKINS. The gentleman from New York must know that when money is covered into the Treasury under the law it becomes a part of the general fund of the Treasury, and cannot be taken out to be used for any purpose unless by regular appropriations.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But there is a law already providing for this special payment.

Mr. REED. No, there is not.

Mr. CALKINS. By no means, there would be no authority for it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have completely, I think to the satisfaction at least of every reasonable man, vindicated the foul charge which the gentleman made last Thursday against the Secretary of the Navy; and I want to say in the presence of this House and of this country that my deliberate judgment is that every honest and candid man will simply say that this performance of the gentleman from New York in shifting his ground as he has done this morning is a mere subterfuge. That is my judgment, and I believe will be and is the judgment of every man who heard his former statement. In his remarks last Thursday he would have this House and the country to understand, and I submit that was the gravamen of his charge, that the Secretary of the Navy was dishonest and corrupt in the particulars which he specified. For what can be more dishonest or corrupt than to take advantage of a Government position and hold money belonging to the people and allow it to draw interest, not for the people's benefit or for the benefit of the Government! What could be more corrupt than the indirect charge that a great officer of this Government was keeping the money of the people and would not turn it into the Treasury, but would hold it until after the next political campaign?

Now, sir, it is against these very charges that I inveigh. It is against that sort of innuendo, that sort of indirection that I raise my voice. I know that some men are so constituted that instead of deliberately walking up and attacking a man fairly and openly, they spring from a dark alley with dagger in hand to attack their victims. I do not think that is honorable warfare; nor do I think, sir, that on this floor any gentleman who occupies a position such as the gentleman from New York occupies ought to make an attack upon a man in this way. If he dared not make a direct charge, common decency and common honesty ought to have warned him to keep his mouth closed until he had evidence to support such charges. That is all I wish to say. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, rose.

Mr. MULDROW. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how much time the gentleman from New York proposes to occupy?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I shall only occupy about five minutes.

Mr. MULDROW. Then I will not demand the regular order until the expiration of that time, but I give notice now to gentlemen that I shall insist upon the regular order immediately afterward.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. Mr. Speaker, with the personal remarks of the gentleman from Indiana I confess that I do not care to deal. That is not in my line. Vituperation is no answer to argument.

This is the fact: that I made no imputation either by way of indirection or subterfuge, nor have I dealt any blow of the assassin, as the gentleman chooses to call it, against the Secretary of the Navy. I can leave the Secretary of the Navy with his own record and I can stand upon mine.

But when the gentleman says that I have shifted my ground from the charge which I made when last this subject was before the House, I refer him to the official record of the proceedings of this House. The last words that I uttered in the House on that subject were as follows:

And now, when the investigation is made, gentlemen will find that although the money may be in the custody of the Treasurer of the United States, it is not covered into the Treasury in the manner the law requires, but it is still subject to the control of the Secretary, and that is the gravamen of my statement.

Now, then, I reiterate this statement, and I have proven it. When the gentleman refers to these old materials which he says the Secretary of the Navy is not responsible for, I refer him to the law bearing upon the subject, of August, 1882, which the Secretary has not complied with any more than he has complied with the law in regard to the sale of the vessels.

And when any such old material can not be profitably used as aforesaid the same shall be appraised and sold at public auction after public notice and advertisement shall have been given according to law under such rules and regulations and in such manner as the said Secretary may direct. The net proceeds arising from the sales of such old materials shall be paid into the Treasury. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Navy annually to report in detail to Congress, in his annual report, the proceeds of all sales of materials, stores, and supplies made under the provisions of this act, and the expenses attending such sales.

His report does not contain a word upon the subject beyond giving the gross amount of sales as $138,000. The gentleman from Indiana holds a paper which he says contains the detailed information. He asks why I did not go to the Secretary of the Navy to get this information. The law required this information to be placed "in his annual report in detail, with the expenses of the sales."

Mr. CALKINS. You will find it all there, if you will only look.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I have searched every page and can not find it. I will be glad to be referred to it, and will make the necessary correction if the gentleman will show it to me. I find a statement of the sales of the vessels.

Mr. CALKINS. You will find it after the report as to the sales, the amount of which is $138,000.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. But the law says it shall be reported in detail with the expenses of the sales.

Mr. CALKINS. The Secretary makes rules and regulations and you know what they are. If you look into the report of the Secretary you will find that the yards make these reports and that they are included in their annual reports.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman says my charge against the Secretary of the Navy that he does not comply with the law is not true. I have pointed him in regard to the sales of the vessels to one violation of the law when the Secretary failed to pay the net proceeds into the Treasury. The gentleman tried to obscure that plain mandatory provision of the law by referring to the portion of the act which relates only to unfulfilled sales and to which my charge had no reference.

And now as to old materials the gentleman says I have insinuated something. I do not insinuate anything. But I charge that the provisions of the statute have not been complied with, and that this Congress is not in possession of the information which the Secretary is bound to give in regard to the sales of these old materials. More than that; I have asked the Treasurer if he has any deposits for sales of old materials, and he says he has not. I have no doubt they are on deposit somewhere. I repeat and reiterate the fact that the provisions of the law have not been complied with by a great officer of this Government; and if I had done less than I have done in stating the facts to the House and the country I should have failed in my duty as a Representative on this floor. [Applause on the Democratic side].

Mr. CALKINS. I desire to have printed in the RECORD a statement of the law and the facts as to these old materials as prepared in the Department.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have no objection to that.

The statement is as follows:

SALES OF MATERIAL.

The sales of material were authorized in the act of August 5, 1882, which directed the Secretary of the Navy "to cause an account to be taken of the stock of stores and supplies pertaining and belonging to the several bureaus of the Navy Department, in which account shall be stated the original cost of each article and the date of purchase, so far as the same is known, and cause an appraisement of the present value of such stores and supplies to be made and entered in such account; and said appraised value, when so entered, shall hereafter be the price at which they shall be charged in accounting with the several bureaus. Such appraisal shall be made by boards of officers of the Navy to be designated by the Secretary; and all such stores and supplies that shall be found by boards of appraisers to be unserviceable for use in the Navy, shall be condemned and sold in the manner hereinafter provided for the sale of old materials, and the proceeds thereof, after deducting the cost of such appraisal, condemnation, and sale, shall be paid into the Treasury."

Owing to the length of time required for an account to be taken of all the property in the hands of the Navy Department and its bureaus, and for making an appraisal, and for condemnation of what was unserviceable, the sales did not take place until September and October, 1883. The gross amount realized, as stated in the Secretary's report, page 19, was about $138,000, from which was to be deducted under the law "the cost of appraisal, condemnation, and sale," and the net proceeds were to be paid into the Treasury. The sales were made by public auction, at the various yards and stations, the paymasters at the yard receiving the proceeds, paying the costs therefrom, and themselves depositing the proceeds in the Treasury.

Remittances from the paymasters, as well as their accounts, are sent direct to the Treasury, without going to the Navy Department, and the accounts are audited in the same manner as other accounts by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

Of the total amount, $71,000 has been deposited, according to the books of the Treasury, by remittances made from time to time by the paymasters, to be covered into the Treasury as "miscellaneous receipts." Deducting the costs of the sales, there remains about $50,000 still in the hands of the various paymasters, to be by them covered into the Treasury when all accounts shall have been settled. In some cases a delay in settlement has arisen from claims of purchasers that the articles sold were not of the quality, quantity, or measurement represented. A further delay has been caused by the fact that the Bureau of Ordnance having on February 26 presented the question to the Department whether under the law of March 3, 1875, the proceeds of the sale of ordnance material were not applicable to the purchase of new material, the question, after consultation with the officers of the Treasury, was decided affirmatively, and the proceeds of such sales, as far as the same had not already been covered in, were directed to be retained for the purposes of the bureau.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. As to the communication from the Secretary of State in relation to the bill for the support of the diplomatic and consular service, communicated to the House this morning in a message from the President, I understand it will be more satisfactory to the other side of the House to have it immediately printed, to which I give ready assent.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the message and accompanying letter will be printed.

There was no objection.

BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. VANCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering reports from the Committee on the District of Columbia. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C. The pending motion was to lay the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Tellers had been appointed on that motion.

Mr. MULDROW. In consequence of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], I ask that the further consideration of the bill be not had at this time, and that it be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say that the debate on the bill had been concluded. Such debate had been had as was satisfactory to the gentleman from Virginia and the Committee on the District of Columbia, and a motion was made to lay the bill aside to report it favorably to the House. Tellers had been ordered on that motion. I do not see any reason for postponing the further consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers reported that no quorum had voted.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is exactly the condition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MULDROW. Is it not in order to withdraw the motion to lay the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair had ordered tellers to ascertain the sense of the committee on that question.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I did not understand that debate was necessarily closed upon that bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. Debate on the bill was not necessarily closed; but the object was to dispose of it, to lay it aside and take up another bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing the bill over for the present?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. SHELLEY, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BLOUNT, will resume their places.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire to ask what was the condition of the bill at the time the vote was being taken, and particularly whether the motion to substitute the aqueduct site for the site at Three Sisters had been adopted? I do not remember whether it had been or not. I think we should know how the bill stands before we proceed to vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee had considered the bill and reached that point that a motion was made to lay it aside and report it favorably to the House; and on that motion a quorum did not vote, whereupon tellers were ordered.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will ask for the reading of the bill as it stood at the point when the vote by tellers was ordered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the reading of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but was interrupted by Mr. MULDROW, who said: I object to the consideration of this bill at the present time.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman can not do that. The tellers are on the floor and the Committee of the Whole is dividing.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that after a bill has been under consideration the question of consideration can not be raised upon it; it comes up as unfinished business.

Mr. RANDALL. If I understand this matter the request is made that the bill be passed over for the present because of the absence of the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia. That, of course, must be done by unanimous consent. The bill relates to a portion of his own district, and I really think as a matter of courtesy the Committee of the Whole should allow the bill to be passed over.

Mr. MULDROW. I objected to the consideration of this bill, and the first matter to be decided is whether the Committee of the Whole will now consider the bill.

Mr. BLOUNT. In reply to that I wish to say that the Committee of the Whole has already determined to consider the bill, and it has been considered for some time and it comes up now as unfinished business. Not only that, but tellers had been ordered upon the motion to lay the bill aside and report it favorably to the House when the committee last had this bill under consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. And the Committee of the Whole was dividing?

Mr. BLOUNT. It was dividing.

Mr. RANDALL. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think that this is a reasonable request to make, when the chairman of the committee reporting the bill is absent?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] object to the consideration of this bill at the present time in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MULDROW. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is the duty of the Chair to report that fact to the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. Is it not too late for such an objection as that to be made, even if in order at all on unfinished business? The Chair had already directed the tellers to take their places, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] had asked that the bill be read, to which there was no objection, and the reading of the bill had been commenced by order of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. And then the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] made objection to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that that objection comes too late, even if it was in order at all.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It was not only too late, but I hold that the gentleman from Mississippi could no more raise that objection to-day than he could during the last session of the Committee of the Whole when this bill was under consideration and after its consideration had been begun. Besides, the reading of the bill having been commenced to-day, I submit that an objection to the reading of the bill is also too late.

Mr. BLOUNT. The Chair had ordered the tellers to take their places.

The CHAIRMAN. But the tellers had not taken their places.

Mr. BLOUNT. That makes no difference.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will state that for myself I am willing that the whole matter shall go over.

Mr. STORM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STORM. What would have been the next step on the day when this bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole after the committee divided and found itself without a quorum on the motion to lay this bill aside to be reported favorably to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. It would have been the duty of the Chair to report to the House the fact that the Committee of the Whole had found itself without a quorum.

Mr. STORM. Then why should we not commence at that point now?

Mr. MORSE. If my friend will allow me, I will answer him by saying that we do not commence at that point now from the very fact that the committee to-day finds itself with a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not gainsay the parliamentary correctness of the position of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT]; but I do say that where an act of courtesy is asked, in view of the absence of the chairman of the committee, and where the subject-matter of the bill relates to his own district, it is but seldom that the House has ever refused to extend that courtesy.

Mr. BLOUNT. As the gentleman puts it upon a matter of courtesy, allow me to say that this bill was taken up and discussed for a very large part of the day. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR] was here that day and had charge of the bill. After discussion the mind of the Committee of the Whole was against the bill, as evidenced by a vote of about two to one against laying the bill aside to be reported favorably to the House. The point of order was then made that no quorum had voted. The bill now comes up to-day as unfinished business, and the committee should proceed to dispose of it.

I do not understand that this is a matter that relates to the district of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR]. It is a question whether or not the people of this District and of the country are to be taxed for the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac. It has been constantly held in the discussion here that this bridge is not in the interest of the district of the gentleman from Virginia, but is in the interest of this city and of the Government, because the Government has a national cemetery at Arlington and a Signal Service post across the Potomac. I do not think it is fair to put this question on a matter of courtesy simply after it has gone so far. The bill was fully discussed, to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Virginia, who was here.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to discuss the merits of the bill at all. If it is a bill of the character which the gentleman describes, the two-third vote against it is not likely to be lessened, and I shall probably be found with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] in the position that this bridge is not properly located. But I do say that as proposed it will cross the Potomac into a portion of Virginia which is embraced in the district of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BARBOUR], the chairman of the committee having reported this bill, who is now absent from the House.

Mr. BLOUNT. And I wish to say that the gentleman from Virginia was apparently satisfied with the discussion of this bill, and the motion had been made to lay it aside to be reported favorably to the House. The Committee of the Whole understands the bill fully, and I think think while the matter is in the minds of members it is due to the country that it should be determined one way or the other.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Being entirely unacquainted with the rules of this House I will ask this question: Is it ever too late for a majority of this House to be courteous to the absent chairman of a committee? As regards the merits of this bill, I was not here when it was taken up, and I do not know what was said in reference to it.

But the question involved is whether or not there shall be a free bridge built somewhere. There is no question that the District of Columbia and the inhabitants of the State of Virginia are interested in this question, because at Georgetown there is now a bridge over which no one can pass with a double team without paying a toll of 50 cents, which is a very great tax to everybody having occasion to use that bridge.

All that is asked by the committee now is that this question be not considered for the present. In the House the request was made that the bill be sent back to the committee, but gentlemen for some reason or other captiously object. It can not be possible that it is in the interest of the people of the District of Columbia or the people of Virginia. It may possibly be in the interest of the men who own the toll bridge. I can not see any other interest which any one can have in insisting that this question be now discussed when the committee desire its postponement. Therefore I ask that the House by a majority vote, if it is possible, extend the courtesy which is asked by reason of the absence of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say a single word in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS]. The law under which this District is governed does not contemplate that the District Committee shall have jurisdiction over a matter of this kind. It directs that the District commissioners make their estimates, which, under the rules of this House, go to the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on the District of Columbia has no more jurisdiction over this question than the Committee on the Territories, or any other committee. It does not become the gentleman, in view of this fact, to say that any one has objected "captiously," when the rules of this House do not intend that his committee shall have jurisdiction of this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. BLOUNT. I object.

Mr. MULDROW. Now, Mr. Chairman, I object to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects to the consideration of the bill. The committee will rise and report the objection to the House.

Mr. STORM. I raise the point that it is too late to object to the consideration of the bill, the bill having been considered.

Mr. BLOUNT. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] is correct in his point. The Chair had directed the tellers to take their places, and they had advanced for that purpose, when the gentleman from Ohio asked for the reading of the bill, which the Clerk was doing——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk, as the Chair understands, had not begun to read the bill, and the tellers had not taken their places when the gentleman from Mississippi made the objection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The Clerk had commenced the reading.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that the reading of the bill had begun.

Mr. McCOMAS. Since that time there have been further proceedings, and at least two speeches upon the merits of the bill by the gentleman from Georgia. The gentleman from Mississippi now objects to the further consideration of the bill, which has twice been debated by the gentleman from Georgia. I ask whether that is not in order at this time?

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that according to the statement of the gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. McCOMAS] the bill has been considered and debated.

Mr. MULDROW. I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The reading of the bill having been begun——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio call for the reading of the bill?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I call for the continuance of the reading which was begun.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the reading of the bill?

Mr. MORSE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I desire the Chair to rule on the point of order whether, the reading having begun, an objection can come in now and prevent the completion of the reading.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has ordered the tellers to take their places.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But I think the Chair must rule on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the recollection of the Chair that the bill was not in course of reading—that the Clerk had not begun the reading.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is a question which the Clerk can settle. I am certain I heard some portions of the bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio states that the bill was in course of reading. If that be true, the Chair will order that the bill be read.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MULDROW. I desire to say that if this bill should be reported back favorably to the House I will make a motion to recommit it to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. I submit that debate is not in order.

Mr. MULDROW. I only wanted to make that statement.

Mr. STORM. I object to debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will take their places.

Mr. MOULTON. Will the Chair state the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 87, noes 46.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not raise the point of no quorum.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. HARDEMAN. I give notice, Mr. Chairman, that we will ask for a vote by yeas and nays on this question in the House.

COMPLETION OF DISTRICT SEWERAGE SYSTEM.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next bill in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the principal main drainage and the auxiliary sewers of Washington and Georgetown, in accordance with the plans on file in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That notice for proposals shall be given and contracts for the construction of said sewers made in the manner now provided by law in cases of building new sewers in the District of Columbia: Provided, That notice for proposals shall be given for thirty days; and in addition to the newspapers in which notice is now required to be given, said notice shall also be given in one newspaper for thirty days in each of the cities of Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Louisville, and Richmond.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the aforesaid appropriation, for the construction of said sewers, in the manner now provided by law for similar work done in said District.

SEC. 4. That 50 per cent. of the amounts so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrants of the commissioners of the District shall be charged to the said District in the same manner that the cost of similar work is now charged: Provided, That the amount so charged to the District of Columbia shall be reimbursed to the United States, without interest, in annual installments of $50,000, commencing with the fiscal year of 1885 and 1886.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask for the reading of the report which accompanies the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SHELLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, submitted the following report:

The purpose of this bill is to complete the system of sewerage in the District of Columbia and provide for an appropriation of $500,000.

The committee have taken pains to inform themselves of the necessity and advantages resulting to the citizens of the District as well as to the officials of the Government who temporarily reside here.

Upon investigation we find that the usual appropriation for purposes of this character is not sufficient to enable the authorities to make such improvements as the rapid growth of the city requires. And they are therefore compelled to resort frequently to temporary expedients, in order to protect the citizens as well as transient residents from the evils consequent upon an imperfect system of drainage. They are thus forced to spend large amounts of money for mere temporary improvements, which in the end are in a manner wasted.

We have therefore come to the conclusion that economic as well as hygienic considerations require that the sewerage system should be completed without delay. The hygienic advantages are so ably presented in the accompanying letter from Dr. Smith Townshend, health officer of the District, that we append it to our report as a part thereof.

The amount of money saved in the cost of construction by reason of having the whole appropriation available at once, to be used upon a well-matured plan, will more than equal the interest of the money appropriated.

And, besides, the authorities will, from the completeness and thoroughness of such system of sewerage, be enabled to proceed with the improvements of the streets in a manner suitable to the continued growth of the city.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill as a substitute to the House, and recommend its passage.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, March 31, 1884.

DEAR SIR: It would hardly seem necessary for me to enter into any argument from a sanitary standpoint to show the advisability of or necessity for the passage of the bill making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia. All the authorities on hygiene and public health, from the earliest to the latest, agree that an undrained soil and accumulation of ground water are the conditions most productive of phthisis (consumption) and what are known as malarial diseases.

To prevent the pollution of the ground air about dwellings is the first step in importance when aiming to secure a perfect sanitary condition, and water remaining on the soil and becoming stagnant is one of the most common and prolific sources of this pollution.

In my annual report for the year 1880 I took occasion to show that the extensive works for draining the subsoil undertaken in all civilized countries for the advancement of agricultural projects have incidentally exerted a very beneficial influence upon public health. The construction of sewers for removing the surface water and the liquid refuse from houses has had the important effect of diminishing mortality, which effect is largely attributable to the drying of the subsoil by lowering the ground water. The investigation of Dr. Buchanan with the object of determining the influence of the sewerage works of England on the public health have demonstrated this fact beyond a doubt. The following table shows the general improvement which has taken place in the health of twelve towns, principally in consequence of drainage operations:

Name of place.	Population in 1861.	Average mortality per 1,000 before construction of the works.	Average mortality per 1,000 since completion of the works.	Saving of life, per cent.	Reduction of typhoid fever, rate per cent.	Reduction of phthisis, rate per cent.
Banbury	10,238	23.4	20.5	12½	48	41
Cardiff	32,954	33.2	22.6	32	40	17
Croydon	30,229	23.7	18.6	22	63	17
Dover	23,108	22.6	20.9	7	36	20
Ely	7,847	23.9	20.5	14	56	47
Leicester	68,056	26.4	25.2	4½	48	32
Macclesfield	27,475	29.8	23.7	20	48	36
Merthyr	52,778	32.2	26.2	18	60	11
Newport	24,756	31.8	21.6	32	36	32
Rugby	7,818	19.1	18.6	2½	10	43
Salisbury	9,030	27.5	21.9	20	75	49
Warwick	10,570	22.7	21.0	7½	52	19

This statement, given under the eminent authority of Dr. Buchanan, the medical officer of the local government board of London, forms an unanswerable argument in itself. The large saving of life (32 per cent.) in the towns of Cardiff and Newport, and the very great reduction of typhoid fever and phthisis, seem almost incredible, but its truth is beyond question. I might comment at length upon this table, but the figures speak for themselves.

I can not enter upon any lengthy discussion of the merits of drainage and sewerage as applied to our city, as I am not in possession of information as to the population of wards or squares sewered and not sewered, whereby I might give you a comparison of the deaths resulting from certain diseases in the separate sections. I send you, however, herewith two maps, one prepared by Captain Greene, assistant to the engineer commissioner, in 1880, to show the location of the sewers, and the other, prepared in the health department during the same year, to show the location of the deaths from lung diseases in the city during that year. I have marked corresponding sections on these maps showing the large proportion of deaths in unsewered portions of the city which are sparsely populated. Of course there are many deaths shown in other quarters than the two marked and where sewers are laid; but taking into consideration the population of the unsewered as compared with the sewered portions, the death-rate preponderates largely in favor of the former. I regret that I have not figures of population by sections to illustrate this fact more satisfactorily, but any one acquainted with the maps and the city can readily point out the location of the densely populated sections and those sections more sparsely settled.

As I said in the commencement, I hardly think an argument in favor of sewerage as productive of improvement in sanitary conditions, and consequent promotion of the public health, is necessary. There can be no reasonable question on this point; and I trust that the committee will act favorably upon the request for aid in the performance of the very necessary work of completing the system of sewerage for the District of Columbia.

Very respectfully, &c.,

SMITH TOWNSHEND, M. D.,
Health Officer District of Columbia.

Hon. CHARLES M. SHELLEY,
Committee on the District of Columbia, House of Representatives.

Mr. SHELLEY. It is hardly necessary for me to add anything, as the report just read explains the necessity for this appropriation. I know it is a large amount to be appropriated for any one purpose in the District of Columbia, but the question of sewerage is a very important one, not only to citizens, but to visitors and those who sojourn here for a short time. The manner of extending the sewerage system heretofore practiced by the commissioners has not been economical or successful. They have not had the means necessary to extend it from time to time in the best way. They had to resort to all kinds of temporary expedients to furnish relief to particular localities. By making this appropriation the commissioners will be able to construct all of the main sewers, so that the annual appropriations derived from the revenues of the District will be sufficient to make lateral and auxiliary sewers which may be necessary to complete the system, and it is important to the health of the District that these main sewers should be constructed as rapidly as possible. Besides that, it is the most economical way to do the work. Temporary or small contracts cost more than if the whole system were let out under one contract. The amount of money involved will invite such competition that the price at which the work can be done will be sufficiently low to justify the advance of the amount by the General Government, to be paid back by the District in annual installments. The Government has entire control of the revenues of the District, and there is no possible chance for the District to avoid paying it back. I will yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I wish to inquire relative to a proviso in the fourth section of the bill, which not only provides, in accordance with action heretofore taken, the Government shall bear one-half of the expense, but it forces the Government to pay the entire cost, and it will not get its money back for five years. Why is it the Government is to furnish this money for that length of time, and without interest, when it has a large debt upon which it is paying interest?

Mr. SHELLEY. The purpose was to make the matter as light on the District as possible, when it did not entail additional expense. Annual appropriations often increase the total amount of such works, and the Government itself will save money by making at once appropriation for the necessary work. We thought in that view of the question it would be very well to forego the interest. By making the appropriation at once we can save from 15 to 25 per cent. of the cost price of the work.

Mr. MCMILLIN. If the District of Columbia is making that amount can it not afford to reimburse the Government the interest?

Mr. SHELLEY. The amount of interest is not important at all. I do not think it would hurt either if required to be paid or otherwise. The District will have so many lateral sewers and so much else to do to complete its system, in addition to its proportion called for on this improvement, it ought to be relieved from the payment of interest on this advance.

I yield now to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, there seems to have been a general concurrence of sentiment as to the advisability of this measure on the part of all persons having charge of the affairs of the District of Columbia. The commissioners of the District of Columbia, the health officer of the District, and the Committee on the District of Columbia have given to this matter a thorough and careful consideration, and for once every person connected therewith seems to be agreed that this question is one of vital importance to the health of the city.

Now the report which has been read sets out all the facts that we need to have. Dr. Townshend's report at the same time ought to satisfy every member of this House that this is a question of paramount importance and pressing necessity. I do not understand, therefore, why I am called upon to say a word in favor of a proposition which nobody, it seems to me, objects to or ought to object to. It may seem that because it is proposed temporarily that the Government shall furnish all of the money in the first instance and then receive back whatever portion belongs to the District of Columbia to furnish, is the only question that needs any consideration, discussion, or explanation. That the system of sewerage is demanded by every person who knows anything about this District there is no question, and probably no two opinions.

Sir, I am loath at all times to take up the time of this House by speaking upon any question that comes before it, and in this case I think absolutely that I am doing the cause no good by detaining the House further, since I can not conceive of an objection resting against the measure. I trust, therefore, that the bill will go through and without lengthy discussion.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW].

Mr. MULDROW. I have no desire to say anything with reference to this bill unless there is some objection to it. It ought to strike the mind of every member at once that it is a matter of great importance to have this work done.

The CHAIRMAN. What motion does the gentleman from Alabama make?

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope that will not be the action of the committee on this bill. I thought, sir, that we had gone to the very outer edge, to the extreme limit, of liberality in appropriating money from the public Treasury to relieve the property-holders of this District from their just share of taxation. But this goes even a step further, and advances or proposes to advance a half a million of money out of the public Treasury to do the ordinary work of draining the city, and at the same time run the risk of the refunding of one-half of the money by the city at some future time, without interest and without any provision to secure the return of the half of the half million chargeable to the District. I have heard it stated, and I have no doubt that the statement is substantially correct, that we are paying out of the public Treasury annually to relieve the property-holders here from taxation more than was paid for the first seventy-five years of our history for corresponding purposes.

Why, a few years ago, Mr. Chairman, it was deemed ample provision for this District if the United States, on account of its property here, appropriated one-half of the sum necessary to keep up the police force and the fire department; and even that was called in question year after year. But now the policy seems to be so ingrafted into legislation that it is deemed necessary, right, and proper, that we shall pay one-half of the general expenses of the District and all of the expense of keeping and embellishing the public parks and all public grounds, and we are expected to levy a tax upon the whole people of this country of one-half of the amount annually required for the expenditures of this District. To what extent the private property of this District has been protected from taxation by that method is shown in the fact that the rate of taxes is to-day, I believe, but 1½ per cent. upon the usual valuation of property. That is to say, the total tax levied upon the property of this District upon the assessed value of the property is less than one-half of the tax paid in any other considerable city of the country. And I venture to say, sir, when you take into consideration all the other elements of taxation from which property in this city is exempt, that the property in this city pays but little over one-third the tax borne by the people of other cities.

Gentlemen must bear in mind that the people of other cities are taxed to keep up their public parks and everything affording embellishment and recreation; here the whole charge is borne by the people of the whole country, millions of whom will never see these elegant and costly parks.

Mr. MULDROW. In that connection let me interrupt the gentleman to say that my understanding is this 1½ per cent. does not cover the special taxes levied for special purposes or improvements; and that tax for special improvements is also chargeable to the particular property which is benefited by the particular improvement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I excluded the special tax from my estimate. In my own State all property in any considerable city is subject to a taxation, State, township, county, and local included, fully twice as great as that borne by property in this city. There is one fact that gentlemen ought not to overlook, that until our public men came to be largely identified with the ownership of property in this city, in some instances beyond the ownership of homes even indeed to the extent of holding real estate for speculation—until that practice sprang up the whole people of the United States were not taxed for the purpose of largely relieving the property here from the ordinary burdens of taxation. But it would seem that just as those property interests grow so grows the determination to relieve property here from bearing its proper and legitimate burdens of taxation.

I am well aware of the fact that special causes, social or otherwise, are gradually gathering around this capital which have a tendency to influence legislative action. That is not at all surprising or remarkable. But it is remarkable that we should permit our interests in property to influence even in the remotest degree the acts of Congress touching such measures of legislation as involve that property. There have been great changes in the last few years. But a few years ago the ownership of property here in this capital by public men was almost unknown. John Quincy Adams, when he wrote in his note-book on taking his seat in the Senate that he had disposed of his bank stock lest it should be thought that his interest in the Bank of the United States should in any degree influence his conduct as a legislator, is a common yet noble example of the views of our public men of former years; yet we have entered into an arrangement of partnership touching taxation between this District and the United States by which, when a member of the House or Senate, owning property here, votes at all, he must vote in regard to this very question of relieving his own property from its legitimate burden of taxation or imposing on it the burden it should bear—a most delicate power to exercise.

Mr. STORM. I desire to ask the gentleman if sewerage and other municipal improvements were made in this city as made in other municipalities in other sections of the country, taking in view the property benefited by the improvement, what should be the proportion the General Government should pay for these improvements?

Mr. HOLMAN. A mere bagatelle.

Mr. STORM. That is what I supposed.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nobody would object that in making sewers or any other features of local improvement here the United States should bear its portion of the burden in proportion to the value of its property. But my friend from Pennsylvania will remember that in the eagerness which personal interest always creates here and everywhere else to throw burdens on the whole people instead of on the property interested, an extraordinary theory has sprung up that the public highways, the streets and alleys, the parks that we adorn and improve for the embellishment of this city, the very monuments, memorials, and fountains we erect, the grounds in which they stand, are all the property of the United States, and should be assessed and taken into account in determining what proportion of the burden the United States should assume.

It is a most extraordinary suggestion, but of course it took hold. It is the most extraordinary suggestion that ever came from the ingenious few who live by devising means to reach the earnings of the many. Every State in the same sense owns the public highways. Did anybody ever suppose that that threw burdens on the State? As to your public property at capitals and county seats all over the Union, it is understood that the burden shall not be thrown on the body-politic, but on the private property of the citizens. But the proposition here that the United States should bear this burden as a property-holder would be scouted. If you submit this proposition to any fair-minded man who has no property interest here he would say at once that if the United States bear their portion of the burdens of this District in proportion to their property employed in public affairs in its relations to the other property of the District, it is the last cent of burden in supporting the government of this District the labor of the whole people of the United States should be called on to bear.

When I first had the honor of coming upon this floor a plain, unpretending simple government was carried on here in this city, administered by a mayor and common council. It was a government directly in harmony with your institutions, and was a pure, honest, efficient government. But men saw the opportunities of making fortunes by pressing upon Congress that extraordinary organization which is known as the District government, consisting of a governor and a legislative body. And then and not till then here at your capital money began to flow from your Treasury in costly and corrupting expenditure. Then the effort was made to produce exactly the result which our fathers intended should not be produced in locating the capital here; their purpose being that a community should grow up around the capital in harmony with your institutions, not large enough by social influence or otherwise or by large business interests to influence the action of Congress.

No point could have been selected so favorable to the patriotic views of the men of that day who fixed here the seat of government. It was not a place for commerce, because it lay beyond the point where commerce from the ocean could be made available. It was no place for manufacturing industries; they would go either northward or southward on the great bay. The point was selected where in the nature of things a great and powerful city could not be built up; a community would arise such as would be convenient, suitable, and proper for the public offices and capital of the country.

But the effort has been made deliberately since 1869 to give your capital such proportions as that at least by its social influence it should control the action of Congress. I admit that up to this time the force of that influence is only seen in these extraordinary measures by which the property-holders here are relieved from just and reasonable burdens—burdens borne by the people of other cities of this country—and the weight thrown on the tax-payers of the entire country. I do not believe that is right. I never have seen the time since that scheme of 1869 sprang up which right under the eyes of Congress built up that enormous debt of $33,000,000, half of which is believed to be fraudulent, and the payment of which you have guaranteed and the one-half of the interest on which you are paying regularly and the principal of which you will ultimately pay—I have never seen the time when by my vote my constituents should be taxed to bear the burden here beyond that which the property owned by the United States should bear in its just relations to the other property of the District. I am willing to vote that, but nothing more. But that would be a mere bagatelle. Every improvement connected with the Government property has been paid for out of the Treasury in full. You have paid the whole of that, and now you are called upon to make improvements for the benefit of the other property of the District and relieve it of its just and reasonable burdens.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. What is the proportion of the property owned by the Government in the city of Washington?

Mr. HOLMAN. If you take all the real estate, the streets, the alleys, the parks, public buildings, charitable institutions, monuments, and fountains into the account and charge them all to the United States, including all the public grounds appropriated to the benefit of the population of this District, it is said their aggregate value will be one-half the value of the whole property of the District. But what an idea—appraising streets! In determining what portion of the tax a given tax-payer should pay, to say that the streets and public highways should be taken into account is an idea that has never been suggested anywhere except right here, and that for the purpose of trying to create a burden on the whole people which ought to be borne by the citizens of this District.

Mr. SHELLEY. This bill originated with myself. I was not influenced by any personal consideration whatever in suggesting it. I do not, unfortunately, own any property in the District of Columbia. I have no social relations here that have any particular influence on me. Nobody suggested to me such a measure as this, not even the commissioners of the District. Whatever of merit or demerit there is in it I am responsible for it.

Having no personal interest in it, but having, as I thought, a responsibility which charged me with the duty of limiting and economizing in every possible way the expenses and the resources of the Government, I saw that the completion of this system of sewerage would be accomplished most economically to the Government by appropriating the amount required at once. We are now called upon to make these appropriations from year to year, and the work is to be let out in small contracts and the sewers built in small sections. We can not go on and complete a comprehensive system of sewerage by these small annual appropriations. Therefore, looking at it from the most selfish standpoint in favor of the Government of the United States, it seemed to me that the most economical way was to make the appropriation at once and have all the work contracted for and carried on at the same time.

I am not conscious of there operating on me any of the influences of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] speaks. I have no personal interest of any kind in this matter. It is true I am somewhat concerned about my health, as I am about the health of the members of Congress and of all citizens of the country who have occasion to come here. I believe that the health of members of Congress and of the people brought here would be better preserved by a prompt and complete system of sewerage. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SPRIGGS].

Mr. MCMILLIN. Before the gentleman yields the floor I desire to ask him what objection he can have to striking out the proviso to which I called attention, the proviso of section 4, which I will read:

Provided, That the amount so charged to the District of Columbia shall be reimbursed to the United States, without interest, in annual installments of $50,000, commencing with the fiscal year of 1885 and 1886.

If the gentleman will pardon me one suggestion, I will state that I think the interest both of the Government of the United States and of the District of Columbia requires that that proviso should be stricken from the bill. The interest of the Government requires it, because we ought not to loan money without interest when we have such an enormous debt hanging over us, $250,000,000 of which we could pay to-day if we had the money. And it is not for the interest of the District of Columbia, because by these means we would be heaping upon them a debt for a future day, when we ought to try to make their revenues meet their obligations as they arise.

According to the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] the taxes in this District are only about one and a half dollars on the hundred, and with such taxes the revenues of the District certainly ought to meet its obligations. We ought not to fasten a debt upon this District running through a period of years, especially in view of the fact stated by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] that there are other sewers to be constructed in order to complete the system, which will make drafts hereafter upon the resources of the District. I ask the gentleman to let that proviso go out.

Mr. SHELLEY. You mean the one relating to the payment of interest?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes; I mean the second provision of the fourth section of the bill. The first provision of that section, which meets the difficulty the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] speaks of, is as follows:

That 50 per cent. of the amounts so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrants of the commissioners of the District shall be charged to the said District, in the same manner that the cost of similar work is now charged.

But the second provision of the section provides that even that 50 per cent. shall not be paid by the District at present, but shall be paid in from one to seven years.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will observe that in order to accomplish his purpose the word "charged," in the first portion of the section, should be stricken out and the word "paid" inserted.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that the words "charged to," in the third line of the section, should be stricken out and the words "paid out of the funds of" inserted, and that the word "charged," in line 5, should be changed to "paid;" so that it will then read: "50 per cent. of the amount so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury * * * shall be paid out of the funds of the said District, in the same manner that the cost of similar work is now paid." I suggest to my friend that unless this 50 per cent. is now paid by the District it will not be paid at all. If you loan this money to the District it will never be paid, according to my experience.

Mr. MCMILLIN. After the Government of the United States has shouldered one-half of the expenses of this work I do not think it is good policy to accustom the District to look to us to advance the money to meet the other half of the expense; I agree with my friend from Indiana on that. I trust my friend from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] will consent to let the proviso of this fourth section be stricken out, and let us proceed at least on the system that we have proceeded upon heretofore. That certainly is all the magnanimity which the District of Columbia asks of us, for the gentleman says that is all which they have asked, he having originated this bill himself.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Will the gentleman allow me to make one suggestion?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. The gentleman says that the rate of taxation in this District is $1.50 on the hundred dollars. I understand that real estate in the District is assessed at about its full valuation. That certainly does not occur in very many other cities.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is what in contemplation of law is supposed to occur elsewhere. I presume that when you come right down to the bottom facts it will turn out that while the people of this District are as honest as other people they are characterized by the same evasions of full taxation as characterize people elsewhere.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I desire to say that so far as it has come to the knowledge of the committee the real estate of this city seems to be assessed at about its full valuation.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I regret that this bill, which seemed to the committee to be so fair, should meet with any opposition. The only question which arose in the committee was whether or not the United States in this case should not bear the whole cost of this improvement. It seems to me if gentlemen would properly consider this question they would feel very much as some members of the committee felt in regard to it. Some gentlemen, I apprehend, do not take into consideration the fact that this system of sewerage in this city is required more on account of this being the seat of Government than for any other reason. If the citizens of this District were simply required so to provide for themselves, they would not expect to adopt such a system of sewerage as that now contemplated. Not only the people of this District but our people at home are interested in this question. There is nothing in which the citizens of the whole country are more interested than the providing of such sewerage as may be necessary for the health of the inhabitants of this District and those who may transiently reside here, as is the case with members of Congress. It seems to me that the point raised by the gentleman from Indiana is not a wise one, and I think on further consideration he will not press it.

It has been said that the rate of taxation in this District is light as compared with that in other cities. The rate here is now reduced, it is true, to 1½ per cent. But a few years ago it was 3 per cent. Why has it been reduced? Because of the economical manner in which affairs have been conducted by those now charged with the administration of the District government. As has been stated in the report, it was believed best that the money to be expended for this improvement should be provided before the lettings for the work were made. Persons proposing to contract for the work, knowing the money to be secured by an act of this character so that the work would be paid for by the United States immediately upon its completion, would take contracts at much lower rates than if they were obliged to depend on payment by means of assessments and collections from the property to be benefited.

It seems to me that no gentlemen interested in the improvement, the beauty, the health of the city of Washington can object to the reasonable provision of this bill in regard to the advance to be made by the Government. The District of Columbia is in such a condition that it can not at this time raise the $250,000 necessary as its proportion of the expense of this great work. The Government is simply asked to loan this money—to loan it, it is true, without interest, because the officers of this Government and the people of the United States are as much interested in the preservation of the health of this city as the citizens themselves. It would not be necessary, as I have already intimated, that this extensive system of sewerage should be gone into if it concerned only the permanent residents of this District. It is because this is the capital of the United States, and because the whole people are interested in the health of the city, that this extensive work is demanded at the present time. It does seem to me the Government of the United States is not asked to contribute more than its fair share.

It has been said "The United States are now by law paying one-half of the expenses of the District government," why not adhere to that rule? It has been said also that the United States own more than one-half of the entire property of this District, and I suppose that is conceded to be true. If so, then this Government is not paying any more than it ought to pay.

Now this particular work being unnecessary except on account of the interests which the whole people have in this city as the seat of government and the temporary residence of many of the people of the States, is it unreasonable that the Government should loan to the District of Columbia for five years, even though it be without interest, the proportion of the expense which belongs under the existing law to the District? That is all there is about it.

One gentleman has said he would not ask the people of his State or district to contribute for such a purpose as this. Sir, I am entirely willing that the people of my district should understand that I personally would be in favor of the United States paying this whole tax, because the people of the country at large are more interested in this matter than merely those of the District of Columbia. But we do not propose that this whole expense shall fall upon the Government of the United States, because of the entanglements which might ensue if it should be asked to do so. We think it best that the District should pay its half. We ask simply that the United States loan to the District $250,000, the proportion of the expense belonging to the District of Columbia, this amount to be repaid at the rate of $50,000 each year. Nobody will pretend that the credit of the District of Columbia is not good. Nobody will pretend that the security is not ample. Nobody can doubt that this sum of $50,000 annually will be paid as required by the bill. It seems to me that no gentleman interested in the health of this District can object to this reasonable provision of the bill. I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass.

Mr. POTTER. I certainly agree that the health of the District of Columbia is important; as important as the health of any other city in the land. But we should not forget that all the other cities of the country not only pay all the taxes of those municipalities, but they pay also the taxes upon the Government buildings located there. Before a Government building is erected in the States it is exacted that the land shall be conveyed to the Government upon condition that the property shall be forever exempted from taxation. The taxes upon public buildings in the city of New York where I reside constitute a very large burden, and they are levied exclusively upon the property of the citizens who reside there.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Do they not belong to the citizens?

Mr. POTTER. No, sir; the court-house and post-office are the property of the United States. The property where the post-office is situated was sold to the Government for $500,000, while at the same moment private individuals were offering $1,500,000 for it, and they would have paid taxes upon it forever. That property was conveyed to the Government of the United States, and the city of New York is taxed for all the street service, all the health service, and for every other service in connection with that property.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Does not the city of New York get the benefit of those buildings?

Mr. POTTER. They are not built more for the convenience of the city of New York than the public buildings here are built for the convenience of this city.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Did you not ask the Government to build them?

Mr. POTTER. The Government of the United States built its custom-house in New York in order that it might collect its customs——

Mr. SPRIGGS. That is a public building erected in the city of New York by public appropriations.

Mr. POTTER. It was built as you build every public building here, for the public service and in precisely the same way. We pay our taxes in the city of New York. They exceed $2.25 on the value of the property in that city. That that burden is to be increased by having to pay taxes for the purpose of exempting from taxation the people here in the city of Washington is more than I am willing to consent to.

It seems to me this proposition contained in the pending bill to loan the money of the Government without interest for five years to the District of Columbia can not be justified. If we are to furnish the money on account of the public health, it is perfectly clear to my mind that this District ought to pay a just interest at least on the amount which is to be advanced by the Government. In my judgment if there is any doubt the amount of money will not be repaid by the District of Columbia I insist then this improvement should not be made until the taxes are held to the amount furnished.

Mr. SHELLEY. There can be no doubt, because the revenues of the city go into the Treasury of the United States and are appropriated therefrom by Congress. The commissioners cannot spend a dollar without first having an appropriation made therefor by Congress.

Mr. SPRIGGS. It can not be gotten out of the Treasury except by act of Congress.

Mr. SHELLEY. It goes into the Treasury of the United States, and estimates are made at each Congress upon which the appropriations for the District of Columbia are based.

Mr. POTTER. The proposition is to take out of the Treasury of the United States without the payment of interest the sum of $500,000 to complete the sewerage system of the city of Washington. There is to be no charge on that account against the property here in the District of Columbia for the next five years in the way of payment of interest. It is a proposition to levy that much on the other cities of the United States for the benefit of the holders of the property in this District. I submit that is manifestly unjust to be enacted into law by this House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. With the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana to the first part of section 4, striking out the proviso, I am prepared to support the bill. But I do not agree with the gentleman that people living a thousand miles from here are more interested in the sanitary condition of this city than are the people living here themselves. Until they are willing and ready to pay their proportion of this improvement I am not willing to vote to appropriate from the Treasury of the United States to make this improvement for them. The people of this city are not taxed as heavily as the little town in which I reside. They are not taxed as heavily as the people of most of the large cities of the country.

If these improvements are needed they are needed by them more than by anybody else, and they must be willing to come forward and pay their share of the expense. When they are ready to do that I will be ready to vote the appropriation, but not until then.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the organic act to which I had occasion to refer when the Committee on the District of Columbia was called before requires that estimates shall be made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia and submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he shall examine and as far as he approves shall send them to Congress for action thereon. The rules of the House declare the Committee on the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction of all questions concerning the District except matters of appropriation. They provide for a District of Columbia appropriation bill, in which are to be reported such appropriations as the Committee on Appropriations shall see fit to recommend to the House. The Committee on the District of Columbia is expressly excluded from action on subjects of appropriation.

Now, there has been no submission of estimates on this subject in accordance with the requirements of the law. There has been no application to the committee on the part of the commissioners for this work, and I submit these regulations were intended to control the discretion of the House and to inform us by proper estimates as to what ought and what ought not to be done. I submit we ought not to make any appropriation involving the taxation of the people of this District unless done in regular course under the rules of the House.

There are probably other expenditures the District might deem of greater importance. I submit we are acting unwisely when we throw down all bars erected carefully to guard against undue expenditure. I do not believe we ought to go one step further in making appropriations in this irregular way.

Mr. LORE. Will the gentleman point out the law which provides that all the appropriations for this District shall be made by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have not so stated. I have stated only, in order that there might be intelligent action on the part of the House, the organic act required in terms that where any improvements were intended in this city the first thing to be done was a recommendation on the part of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that thereupon he should examine those estimates and exclude therefrom in his recommendation to Congress such as he did not approve, and that then, that being done, it was for Congress to determine what part of these estimates they should provide for. In that connection I said the rules of this House, not the law, provided that all appropriations for the District of Columbia must go to the Committee on Appropriations, and to facilitate that idea the House created a bill especially providing for appropriations for the District of Columbia. In that way we know what we are doing, for under the rules of the House it contains an appropriation based upon the estimates of the commissioners which have undergone the scrutiny and recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury and afterward the action of the Committee on Appropriations. If any other committee may come forward in defiance of the rules of the House, if the Committee on the District of Columbia, which is denied by the rules, may come forward with such propositions, complications would arise, and we would be likely to get into endless confusion.

Mr. Chairman, I do not like the proposition of a loan. During the last Congress, or perhaps the preceding Congress, a very large sum of money was voted for the purpose of increasing the water supply of the District, and in that connection we made an advance to the District by issuing bonds; and, sir, it was not contemplated in that debate that the money so advanced would be refunded to the Federal Government within a period of twenty years. This will be something of the same kind, for here is another proposition of a similar character; and eventually we will find ourselves, if this precedent is adopted, in a condition that whenever the people are not willing to stand additional taxes for the current year there shall be a loan from the Federal Treasury to help them out. I believe, sir, that we have done enough when we have declared that the Federal Government will defray one-half of the expenses of the District. There are no other people in this country so favored as the people in this District in this matter. Why, it has been alleged by way of answer to this, that one-half of the propety here belongs to the United States. But the great bulk of that item, it should be borne in mind, is the streets, the reservations, and the avenues, which were intended for the benefit of the city and which the people of the city enjoy almost exclusively.

I had occasion to say before that for the first seventy years in the history of this capital the Federal Government had not expended as much as was paid out of the Treasury on the part of the United States for the very next year after this act went into effect in this city. It was by reason of the great favor of Congress that this most extraordinary thing was done, whereby we assumed the payment of one-half of the expenses; and I contend that this thing of the District coming forward session after session and asking us to help them from the Federal Treasury has gone to a limit beyond which it was ever contemplated. I would like to know if any member on the committee is able to state how much has been already advanced in this manner. I know in this one single item of the improvement of the water facilities it ran somewhere up into the millions, and I think we ought to stop it. We have done enough. We have been exceedingly liberal, and I do not think we ought to go any further in that direction. It is not safe legislation, nor is it just to the balance of the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. COLLINS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

A bill (S. 83) for the relief of John H. Walker, late a captain in the United States Army;

A bill (S. 445) for the relief of the heirs or legal representative of Robert J. Baugness, deceased;

A bill (S. 838) to consolidate the Bureau of Military Justice and the Corps of Judge-Advocates of the Army, and for other purposes;

A bill (S. 895) for the relief of J. D. Morrison, surviving partner of C. M. & J. D. Morrison; and

A bill (S. 919) for the relief of John M. McClintock.

EXTENSION OF SEWERAGE SYSTEM, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, if this involved only a question of the improvement of a town or city in any one of the States of this Union, it would in all probability be a very simple thing to adjust. But the moment that members on this floor come to deal with matters of this kind, pertaining to the General Government, they look upon it in an entirely different light with reference to the principle upon which they are to act. Take the case of the Hot Springs reservation, for instance. The Government spent there the sum of $90,000 in building sewers or drains. Probably that much more will be required to complete the work; and yet more than one-half of that is entirely upon private property, and on the other half of it the Government own property on one side and private individuals on the other. And yet the whole expense is thrown upon the Government; a principle that gentlemen would repudiate at once if it was applied to their own municipalities. But when we come to Washington we find just this condition of affairs. I do not suppose the Government owns one-tenth of the property through which it is proposed that this extended sewerage system shall pass; and yet we are asked to assume one-half of the total expenditure, and at the same time guarantee the payment of the other half and pay interest upon it also.

Mr. BLOUNT. That is it exactly.

Mr. STORM. Now, in the case of the Hot Springs you will say that the Government owns a valuable piece of property there; that the hot water is an exceedingly valuable possession and belongs to the Government. But the existence of the hot water is what confers immense value upon private property there.

The same may be said here. It may be argued that the Government of the United States owns valuable property. So it does; but private property is enhanced in value by the existence of the Government property here, and the improvements made by the Government upon its property confers immense value upon the property of the private citizens. There is no town in the Union that would not donate lands to the Government to build such improvements upon, and that would not be willing to assume all of the expense of laying off and grading the streets, providing a proper system of sewerage, and doing all that might be necessary to improve the town for the purpose contemplated, because the existence of the Government property would confer value upon private property. Without the existence of the public buildings here and other Government property the private property would be much reduced in value. But the citizens, the private owners, now seek a further donation by imposing a burden upon the rest of the country for the purpose of extending this sewerage system, very little of which will be upon Government property. The beneficiaries will be the owners of private property.

Mr. SPRIGGS. The gentleman will remember that the United States owns the streets also.

Mr. STORM. I know there is a theory that the United States owns all of the streets, and these parties expect the Government to pay largely for the theory. I know there is a difference of opinion with reference to that matter in many of the States. In some it is presumed that the private citizens have a fee-simple in the soil to the middle of the street and the public has only an easement over it. Now, that is the case here. The Government has an easement only in the streets.

The Government makes and keeps up its own parks at great expense. It is true those parks are very pleasant and confer great value on the property adjoining them. That is all right. I am willing the Government should keep those parks, beautify them, plant trees in them, erect fountains in them, furnish them with statuary, and all that. The Government provides for all its own property proper sewerage. And it provides the paving for that property. But after that is done what more, in justice and in equity, is required of the Government? I say when the system of sewerage strikes private property and benefits it, that private property should bear the expense of the improvement to the amount it is benefited.

It was not, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has well said, until gentlemen connected with the General Government, Representatives and Senators in Congress, became interested in private property here that this system of legislation has been inaugurated, which I say does injustice to the Government in order that the burdens of taxation belonging to the individual tax-payers of this city may be escaped.

Mr. MULDROW. I think that the intimation that this report is being urged by officials of the Government does injustice to them and to the committee that reported this bill. I have heard of no officials of this Government asking for this improvement except the District commissioners and the District engineer, whose duty it was to report to Congress what improvements they thought desirable to be made and the amount of money that ought to be expended for those improvements. And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] is mistaken when he says that no recommendation has come from the District commissioners on this subject. A communication has been received from the commissioners in which they recommend the appropriation asked for by this bill and urge upon the attention of Congress the great importance of this subject to the people of the country. The city engineer also makes a report favorable to it. There are but few cities of this country where it is so difficult to have a successful sewerage system as in the city of Washington.

Mr. BLOUNT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MULDROW. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to know whether the commissioners of the District of Columbia have made estimates in pursuance of the law and referred them to the Secretary of the Treasury and whether such estimates for this purpose have come back approved to this House, as the law requires?

Mr. MULDROW. I understand that provision of the law to be for the current expenses and not for any special appropriation which the commissioners may ask at the hands of Congress.

Mr. BLOUNT. I have never understood that there was any such distinction.

Mr. MULDROW. But there are estimates here from the city engineer, in which he shows every item of appropriation asked and where it ought to be expended and how it ought to be expended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. MULDROW. Perhaps there are few cities in this country where it is so difficult to apply a sewerage system as to the city of Washington. In order to make this city healthful by a sewerage system the sewers ought to be carried deep enough under the earth to disgorge themselves in the deep water of the Potomac River; to do so they must be at least eight feet below the surface of the earth; and the city engineer reports that they have found great difficulty in so constructing the sewers that that object shall be accomplished.

Now, sir, healthfulness in this city is a matter of importance to all the people of the country who come here. It is right that the Government, having charge of the interests of all the people of the country, should contribute liberally toward making this city healthful for those who are compelled to spend a great part of their time here in the prosecution of their public duties and public functions. There are thousands of public employés and officials of the Government in this city who are looking anxiously for the proper improvement of the sewerage system of this District. Nowhere are the people of the country so much interested in proper sanitary regulations as in this District. And when we consider the fact that the Government laid out this city upon a most extravagant plan, making broader streets and more of them, broader avenues and more of them, upon which vast expenditures are being annually made for the purpose of keeping them in proper repair, which would not have been necessary if the people of the city had been left to themselves to lay out the city according to their own plans and their ideas of utility and economy—in view of that fact it is right that the Government should contribute liberally toward the expenses of keeping up the city, providing for the improvement of its thoroughfares, providing for the adornment of the streets, the highways, the parks, and the public grounds, and for preparing and maintaining a proper system of sewerage for the health of the people who live in the District permanently, as well as those who visit this city on business.

I myself, sir, would be opposed ordinarily to the Government lending money for any such purpose as this. But here we find an extraordinary condition of things. We find this work pressed upon the attention of Congress by the District commissioners, by the city engineer, by the health officer of the government; and we find that the money belonging properly to the city treasury will not justify the expenditure which is necessary to make this sewerage improvement. Now what are we to do? The health and the lives of the people are involved in this matter; and the District only asks that we loan the money for a given time in order to enable it to contribute its part of the expense of this proposed improvement. I am willing, so far as I am personally concerned as a member of this House, that the District of Columbia should be taxed to the extent of the interest on this loan which it asks. But the committee saw fit to find that that would not be a liberal course on the part of the Government when there were so many Government officers here and so much Government property involved in this matter. Therefore I have stood with the committee; but personally I should be entirely willing to see the property of the District taxed to that extent for the benefit of this loan. But I am fully convinced that this improvement ought to be made and ought to be made at once; and it is in the interest of economy, as shown by the report of the engineer, that the money should be appropriated in bulk instead of by piecemeal from year to year. It seems to me that is a matter that ought to address itself to the good sense of the members of this body.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LORE].

Mr. LORE. I think that we all have a very natural and pardonable pride in the city of Washington. It certainly is the most beautiful city, as reported and agreed upon all hands, or among the most beautiful in the world. We have here people of all the other nations who have any relations whatever with our Government; representatives of all foreign nations find their domicile here with us in our city.

I have heard it said, and so far as I can learn I believe it to be true, that nine-tenths of the people in this city are either directly connected with the Government or are dependent upon those who are connected with the Government. This is therefore purely a Government city. Indeed, it is true it was laid out simply as a seat of government; yet at one time a large portion of it was under water, particularly when there was any flood in the Potomac.

We need not now refer to the times spoken of by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], when, as he says, an economical government prevailed in this District. Suffice it to say that Congress in its wisdom has seen fit to take from this District every right except the right to be governed as Congress may dictate. No person living here has a right to vote; the elective franchise is taken from every person living in this city, unless he is a citizen of some State, and then he must go home to exercise that right.

This District has always been recognized and is recognized to-day as simply the creature of the Federal Government. I say that we have a natural pride in this city, and that natural pride ought to lead us to endeavor to make it a city worthy of our people, a city to which we would not be ashamed to invite the representatives of foreign nations; a city in which we, the representatives of our people, can come together and not have our lives and health endangered by a system of sewerage which is not only not perfect, but is a disgrace.

I have nothing to say in advocacy of the man who once controlled the government of this District other than this: Whatever may have been his derelictions, the fact is apparent that the city of Washington is what it is to-day very much because of the creation of that man's brain. Its beauty has been magnified tenfold by the plans which he devised and by the system which he inaugurated for making it an attractive place of residence.

I have no hesitancy in saying that in the pride which I, as one of the people of the United States, have in this city I would be willing that the entire amount required for the creation of a proper system of sewerage for this city should be paid by the Government of the United States out of the Treasury of the United States, inasmuch as we have taken this District absolutely under our control. As I understand it, every requirement of law has been met in this case. Estimates have been made and submitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and they are here now. The engineer of the District has recommended this measure in strong terms, and I will ask that his letter be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ENGINEER COMMISSIONER,
Washington, D. C., April 3, 1884.

SIR: In response to your request I transmit herewith a tracing showing the system of main sewers of Washington and Georgetown, referred to in your bill providing for its completion, together with an estimate of costs of the several parts remaining to be done. I would suggest that the verbal amendments indicated on the inclosed copy of the bill be adopted.

Nobody can question that the health and comfort of every individual who is called upon to make his home here, even for a limited period, are largely dependent upon a perfected sewerage system; the completion of such a system at an early date is in fact a matter of most vital importance, but to accomplish this within any reasonable time is simply an impossibility, if we are compelled to rely, as heretofore, on the limited means that can be derived from District revenues. It can be done only by an advance of a sum sufficient to construct at once the larger trunk sewers, and this can be accomplished in the simplest manner as proposed by your bill; the District can readily repay its share of the advance at the rate of $50,000 per annum, and still have available for reasonable progress on the smaller lateral sewers leading into the main trunks a sum sufficient to keep up with the wants of the District in this respect.

In addition to the vital question of health, the completion of the trunk sewers will afford the only means of relief against the repeated overflows which occur in many sections of the city with every hard rain or summer shower. Existing sewers are totally inadequate to carrying off the rainfall at such times, and, becoming gorged, the water backs up into buildings in such a way as to cause great distress and loss in many cases; further, the excessive head of water and volume of flow through such sewers subject them to a strain which they were never designed to bear, and threaten them with serious damage at every recurrence of that condition of affairs. When the trunk sewers are completed, the sewerage capacity of each drainage area will be ample to carry off all the water and thereby obviate the evil referred to.

It is also to be observed that the estimated cost of the proposed work will be less if the means are available for its completion as a whole, instead of doing it in short sections, with inadequate appropriations and under small contracts. The saving to the Government from this course, on its share in the final cost of the work, will more than equal the interest on the sum named in the bill as an advance to the District.

I would, in conclusion, call attention to the fact that this bill aims to accomplish only what is imperatively necessary for providing the main channels for sewerage and drainage, which must be constructed in advance of the numerous laterals leading thereto; that the construction of these laterals will keep pace with the advance of building operations and other local improvements; and the aggregate expenditure for their completion will not fall far short of a million of dollars. This will be in addition to the sum advanced by the bill for the main sewers, but will be required only in annual installments of such small amounts comparatively that we may confidently expect to meet all reasonable demands on that account without going outside of the current income of the District.

Very respectfully,

G. J. LYDECKER,
Major of Engineers, United States Army, and Engineer Commissioner District of Columbia.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

Mr. MCCOMAS. I desire, Mr. Chairman, only to call the attention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] briefly to his misapprehension of the organic act of the District of Columbia. It seems to have been his conception, and it was a most remarkable conception, that the Congress of the United States could not appropriate any money for a specific purpose in this District unless it should come through this mode of procedure, should be recommended by the commissioners of the District, referred by them to the Secretary of the Treasury, and then be passed upon by the Committee on Appropriations of this House.

If the gentleman will look at the organic act of this District, which I now hold in my hand, he will find that that requirement applies as, a priori, everybody would suppose it would apply, only to the regular and current expenditures for this District. The commissioners must make their annual report, in which under existing law they must set forth the amounts of money which will be required for the support of the government of the District and for the various charities and other enterprises which are here maintained. That is the whole purpose of that requirement. The organic act was intended not only to provide in what proportion the money of the District should be expended with the money of the Government of the United States, but that when it was expended for the current expenditures and ordinary needs of the government of the District it should be under these natural and necessary safeguards.

Every day which is given to the Committee on the District of Columbia in this Congress bills have been brought forward and passed appropriating money without first going through that procedure, which is only required for the expenditure of public money under existing law in the absence of specific appropriations. The Forty-fifth Congress appropriated money for the carrying out of a system of sewerage in this District, and from time to time money has been appropriated for that purpose. It is rather late now to say that the objection which the gentleman has raised can apply to this matter. This bill does what every other bill of specific appropriation does—it meets a public need by a specific appropriation.

The estimates which, in the absence of a specific act, would be required to be sent to the Secretary of the Treasury are brought to the Committee on the District of Columbia and to Congress; and dollar for dollar, street for street, and item by item the particulars and estimates for this improvement are given.

It seems to me that gentlemen who claim that caution and care should be exercised in order to secure an economical expenditure of public money have two duties to perform; the one is to oppose the improper expenditure of public money, and the second is to be careful that when opposing such improper expenditure they are not themselves going squarely in the face of a proper economy.

I think that any man who will study the map which I hold in my hand and the accompanying estimates must say that on the face of this map the crying need for this improvement is apparent. I can not undertake to say that this plan and these estimates are absolutely correct; I am not an engineer; but the presumption, well known to lawyers and to every man of common sense, is that every public officer acts in the discharge of his duty.

In the letter which has been read from the Clerk's desk we have been informed that there is danger that the waters from the spring rains may engorge themselves and overflow many parts of this city. Why? Because many of the main sewers which were constructed in the period to which reference has been made are too small to receive these currents; and where there are large sewers here and small sewers there only a limited quantity of water can pass through.

The very title of this bill ought to remove some of this misconstruction. It is a bill "making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia;" and it provides money for the purpose of completing the "principal main drainage and the auxiliary sewers." And we are told (I mention it frankly to the House), we are told by the engineer that the money which you now appropriate will not complete the sewerage of this city.

If any gentleman will have the goodness to examine the estimates and show wherein they are wrong I shall be among the first to vote against making this appropriation. But these estimates come from sources upon which we are accustomed to rely as intelligent and true in our appropriations from year to year for this District. The commissioners earnestly recommend this improvement. The engineer warns us that this piecemeal method of improvement is a wasteful expenditure of money, and that if the main sewers are now built the lateral branches can afterward be constructed out of the current expenditures of the District. When we come to build those small lateral sewers the appropriations should follow the course suggested by the distinguished gentleman from Georgia. The recommendations of the commissionsrs should come directly through the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Appropriations. But it is well known that the Committee on Appropriations will not originate legislation for the specific needs of this District, and the procedure of this House and its predecessors, under the rules, shows that the examination of such matters has been the main function of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

It is stated, Mr. Chairman, that on certain charts now in the custody of gentlemen on this floor the defective sewerage of the city is well marked out, and the prevalence of certain diseases in particular localities is directly attributed to the deficiency here and there in the sewerage system. As will be found by an examination of the map, a large part of this improvement is to be made in the eastern part of the city. Fully one-half of the expenditure, as indicated by the red lines on the map, is to be east of the Capitol, not where the main moneys of the Government have been expended.

I charge gentlemen to remember that if heretofore money has been expended in this District by influences which ought not to have operated upon the representatives of the people—I do not say that such has been the case—such expenditures do not seem to have been made east of the Capitol. I repeat, an examination of this map must show any member that these improvements are to be carried out on a general principle, which must confute his doubts and answer his objections.

Now, if for the health of this city, for the health of the employés of the Government in both wings of this Capitol and in the various Departments, this improvement be required, the law of 1878 has provided that the expense of such work shall be divided between the city and the General Government dollar for dollar. This measure, so loudly demanded by public sentiment and public health, is also earnestly asked for by the health officer of the District, whose office was created by the organic law and whose functions embrace matters of this kind. He says this improvement is essential to the health of the city and should not longer be delayed. If the engineer is to be heard on this matter, he says that you will save several times the interest on this money by making the appropriation now in the manner here proposed. If the views of the commissioners of the District are entitled to any consideration, we have had their communication that it is not for the bridge that they care particularly, but that the demands of the health of the people of this city require the completion of the main lines of the sewerage system. If with this concurrent testimony, so ample, and which ought to be conclusive, the mere little matter of interest is regarded by any gentleman as an objection, I apprehend (though I have not conferred with the gentleman in charge of this bill) that the whole committee, rather than endanger the health of this capital, rather than have Congress neglect the duty which is incumbent upon it, would be willing that the provision in regard to allowing this loan to run without interest should be withdrawn. This change being made, gentlemen who oppose the bill can only do so on the ground of being opposed to sewerage, or perhaps on the narrow, contracted idea that every man should build his own sewers; and then what a city you would have for the capital of the United States!

Mr. SHELLEY. I move to amend by striking out, in line 7 of section 4, the words "without interest," and inserting "with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum."

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MCCOMAS], because, forsooth, a bill making appropriations for this District, and coming from the Committee on the District of Columbia, has occasionally passed through this House, has assumed as a necessary and absolute consequence that the Committee on the District of Columbia has jurisdiction of this subject, and that Congress contemplated that everything beyond what he sees fit to call the ordinary current expenses of the District of Columbia should be provided for through the District Committee by special bill.

Now, sir, the rules of the House are as clear as man could make them on this question.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Does the gentleman deny the power of Congress?

Mr. BLOUNT. I never questioned the power of Congress, and the gentleman misapprehended me entirely when he made such an argument. To that I will address myself directly.

I was asking the attention of the House to the organic act and the mode of procedure designed to protect the Government and the District of Columbia, stating how estimates were to be made and what limitations were put upon them. I do not mean to say when Congress had passed one law a subsequent Congress could not change it, but I have referred to the organic act in order to show the mode adopted in order to guard the interests of the Government and the District of Columbia by preventing loose legislation being carried through.

Let me call attention to the rule of the House. Page 78, Rule X, provides:

RULE X.

OF COMMITTEES.

1. Unless otherwise specially ordered by the House, the Speaker shall appoint, at the commencement of each Congress, the following standing committees, viz:

Then Rule XI provides as follows:

RULE XI.

POWERS AND DUTIES OF COMMITTEES.

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committees named in the preceding rule, as follows, viz: Subjects relating—

* * * * * * *

30. To the District of Columbia, other than appropriations therefor: to the Committee for the District of Columbia:

Now, would the gentleman have the House, in the face of this plain rule prohibiting the committee from having anything to do with appropriations for the District of Columbia, believe, because forsooth inadvertently the House passed an appropriation for a bridge or some similar item reported from that committee, it was established as a precedent all appropriations relating to the District should come from the Committee on the District of Columbia? He certainly will not venture to do so when he is aware of what the rule is, and I think I need say nothing further on that point.

The gentleman assumes I have said Congress could not legislate except in a given way. Why, sir, I simply referred, and I am only repeating what I have already said, to what the organic act of this District provided, that in order to guard the members of the House coming up here from all parts of the country against the imposition, against the importunity, if you please, of local officers in this District without any supervision from any sources whatever, Congress provided the estimates of the commissioners should go first to the Secretary of the Treasury, and when approved by him they should be sent, in so far as they were approved with his recommendation, to the House. But what do we find right in the face of that? The gentleman has had read from the Clerk's desk a communication from an officer of this District, an engineer, in response to the District Committee in reference to an item over which that committee has no jurisdiction, and in response to a single member of that committee, he sends in his opinion. The gentleman says some estimates were made, but why were they not submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury? Why should not the usual course have been pursued as contemplated by the organic act before coming to Congress?

The gentleman attempts to meet this objection by saying this is a matter of ordinary expenditure. Why, sir, it is no more a matter of ordinary expenditure than the police force or any other expense of city government. The expense of sewers is a part of the ordinary expense of all the cities of the country, or else my observation is much at fault. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBB] who has had charge of the appropriations for the District of Columbia in this House for several years states they have annually included something in reference to the sewerage of this city. It was intended by the organic act and by the rules of the House that such appropriations should be provided for in bills to be reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MULDROW. I understand Congress passed an appropriation bill, reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, for a bridge at Georgetown, and that it has been the universal practice in the case of such special appropriations for the Committee on the District of Columbia to report them to the House for action.

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish only to say this in answer to the gentleman. He calls this a special matter, and he says the House has sometimes reported through the District Committee appropriations of money. What better answer could I give than to read from the rule that bills containing appropriations for this District shall not come from the Committee on the District, as it has no jurisdiction over the subject, but shall come from the Committee on Appropriations, which has jurisdiction. The rule states the Committee on the District shall not have jurisdiction where there is a dollar of appropriation involved. What better answer can I give to the argument because this committee has consideration of this specific subject therefore we must set aside the law in reference to the District and the rules of the House relating to the appropriation of money.

Mr. MULDROW. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MULDROW. I wish to ask the gentleman where he finds it in the rules of the House providing that appropriations of this character shall come through the general Appropriations Committee of the House?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will answer the gentleman in the language of the rule which I have already referred to:

Subjects relating to the District of Columbia other than appropriations therefor: to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. MULDROW. But where is there any authority in the rules for the Appropriations Committee to take jurisdiction?

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman will find that in the same rule:

Subjects relating to appropriation of the revenue for the support of the government: to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MULDROW. For the support of the Government!

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir; and the gentleman from Delaware [Mr.

LORE] stated, what no one I presume will deny, that the Federal Government has control here, and is the government in the District of Columbia. If it is not, then there is no other, and in exact accordance with that construction the House provided for appropriations for this District through the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LORE. But I did not say that this was an appropriation of the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman misapprehends my statement. I said the gentleman declared that there was no government here except the Federal Government.

Now, sir, I hold in my hand a bill reported from the Committee on Appropriations by Mr. FOLLETT, covering all of the expenses of this District. But will the gentleman from Mississippi undertake to say that under the rules of this House this committee has not jurisdiction of appropriations for the District of Columbia after the uniform practice of the House on this subject is known to him?

Mr. MULDROW. The difference between the gentleman from Georgia and myself is this: I say it has been the practice and the habit of the House to refer the usual current appropriation bills to the Committee on Appropriations; that is to say, appropriations providing for the current expenditures of the District government. But where special legislation is asked for the District which requires appropriation, or where special appropriations are asked for the District, the practice has been to report the bill from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I admit that occasionally the Committee on the District of Columbia have come in here in violation of this organic law with a recommendation not based upon any estimates from anywhere for such subjects, as, for instance, the construction of a bridge. Just last Monday week—and I ask the attention of the House to it, for I say it is improper that it should be done—on the last District day in this House the District of Columbia Committee came in here with a provision in reference to the construction of a free bridge across the Potomac River, when the organic act in express terms provides that in the matter of bridges the commissioners of the District shall make their reports to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he shall make his estimates and submit them to the Congress for the appropriation, if they consider it proper to grant it.

Mr. SHELLEY. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHELLEY. Does not the gentleman know that the Forty-sixth Congress appropriated $140,000 for the construction of that bridge? That law is still on the statute-books and the money is now available in the Treasury for the construction of the bridge. The Chief Engineer of the Government, General Wright, made a report to the Secretary of War upon the subject, and the Secretary of War made his report to Congress, recommending an additional appropriation of $80,000 for the construction of this bridge across the Potomac River. It was thought at that time, or assumed, that the District government had nothing to do with the matter; that it was under the control and direction of the Federal Government. But, notwithstanding that, the District government was required to pay one-half of the expense of the construction of the free bridge.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have yet to learn that the Secretary of War is the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the Secretary of War is charged with making estimates for the District of Columbia which the organic act expressly declares shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the commissioners. I do not know when the gentleman says that this "was thought" to whom he refers or who thought that was the case. I do not know how much force is to be given to that impression, not knowing the persons who entertain it. But I do know from a careful reading of the statutes, and as far as I am able to form an opinion as to what construction ought to be given to them, that the District of Columbia Committee has no right over the question, as I have already shown.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman if I can have sufficient time, for I want to answer all the questions that may be asked in reference to this.

Mr. SPRIGGS. If the gentleman does not wish to be interrupted I will not ask him.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Will the gentleman then state whether we did anything more than advise the appropriation of this sum, and whether it is not a perfectly legitimate and proper thing for us to do, and whether, if approved by Congress, it does not become the law? I ask the gentleman if that is not all we did?

Mr. BLOUNT. I have read the rule upon this question already in the hearing of the House twice and I need not read that again.

Mr. SPRIGGS. I ask the gentleman the question, because I stepped into the room of the Committee on Appropriations and asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] the same question, and he replied that there was no sort of doubt about it. That I understand also to be the opinion of Mr. CALKINS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I do not know what Mr. RANDALL said about it. I submit that the practice of the House in reference to the District of Columbia appropriation bills, from the time of the passage of that organic act onward as to the manner of making appropriations for the District of Columbia, is entirely as I have stated it.

The gentleman refers to the fact that a bridge or some little matter has gone through here from time to time. That I admit. It is an abuse. The appropriations ought to be made, in my judgment, just as the organic act contemplated. If that applies in the matter of a bridge which is specifically designated, why not also in reference to sewers? How does the District of Columbia Committee get hold of the matter of an appropriation at all?

Mr. SHELLEY. If the gentleman will allow me I will explain how the District of Columbia gets hold of the matter. This bill was regularly introduced, and was referred by the House to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes, sir. The gentleman from Alabama introduces this bill himself, I presume, and then writes a letter to the engineer.

Mr. SHELLEY. I referred the bill to him.

Mr. BLOUNT. Yes. He refers the bill to the engineer, when Congress had provided a different mode of procedure to get at what is right and proper.

I do not mean to say my friend does not think it ought to be done. I make no question as to that. I have no doubt my friend believes what the engineer says. But I do say a body like this, having control of the public Treasury, ought not to follow the gentleman from Alabama in this matter, but ought to adopt the mode which has been prescribed for ascertaining what is right and proper in the premises. The appropriation bill for the District of Columbia will come into this House and be considered in due course. All the appropriations it proposes ought to be considered connectedly and we ought to know what we are doing. I hold in my hand a bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOLLETT] from the Committee on Appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia, and I find this item:

For interest and sinking fund on the public debt, exclusive of water bonds, $1,213,947.97.

Nearly one million and a quarter of interest.

The gentleman from Delaware has seen fit to eulogize the gentlemen who were responsible for all this extravagance in violation of law and left us a debt of $26,000,000. When that debt had been incurred there was an appeal on the part of this District, representing that they had no control of the subject, that there had been mismanagement, that there had been maladministration, that there had been lawlessness, that there had been robbery, and that it was equitable and just the people of the country should come in and assume one-half of the public debt. And we are now paying over a million and a quarter of interest on that debt, exclusive of the water bonds.

Still they are not satisfied. That interest has to be paid. And yet we are called upon in addition to make continual advances. Where is the other city in this country which has such advantages as the city of Washington always has?

A great deal has been said about the health of this city. Why, sir, the statistics will show there is not a healthier city in the United States than the city of Washington. Why may they not take the ordinary course in reference to this matter? I trust, sir, that we shall make no more advances. We are paying half the interest now on between twenty and thirty millions of debt which we never contracted. We have advanced several millions of dollars to pay for additional water facilities. And now here is this proposition. For one, sir, I will not give my vote in favor of this irregular proceeding. If occasionally a bill has passed through contrary to the rules of this House, contrary to the contemplation of the law on this subject, let there be no more such bills passed. We owe it to the people who do not live in Washington, we owe it to the people who live in this country from one end of it to the other, to say that this just and wholesome law as to estimates for the District receiving the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury before they are considered here shall be always observed. Even with that restraint upon us we have involved the Government already in a large debt, as the interest provision which I have read from the appropriation bill discloses; and I trust that we will right here and now decide that this is not the time to make appropriations in this way.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting debate on this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VANCE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration business of the Committee on the District of Columbia, had directed him to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown. He further reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

BRIDGE OVER THE POTOMAC.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union has reported with amendments the bill (H. R. 3810). The question is first on the adoption of the amendments.

Mr. MULDROW. My object in moving that the committee rise was to obtain from the House an order to limit debate on the pending bill in relation to sewerage. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia, and pending that, I move that all general debate on the bill be limited to one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would that motion have priority of a motion to recommit the bill (H. R. 3810) reported by the Committee of the Whole now before the House?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to recommit had been made it would have been in order. But another motion is now pending.

Mr. MULDROW. It is my intention at the proper time to move to recommit the bridge bill.

Mr. COVINGTON. I suggest to the gentleman that he make that motion now.

Mr. MULDROW. Very well; I move to recommit the bill (H. R. 3810) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

SEWERAGE SYSTEM OF THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that he moves that all general debate on the bill now under consideration in the Committee of the Whole be limited to one minute.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found duly enrolled a joint resolution and bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall;

A bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker; and

A bill (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla.

SEWERAGE SYSTEM OF THE DISTRICT.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. VANCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole to consider bills reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. By order of the House general debate is limited to one minute on the pending bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MULDROW. I do not desire to say anything further in way of general debate, and will therefore ask that the bill be now read by sections for consideration under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the sum of $500,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of completing the principal main drainage and the auxiliary sewers of Washington and Georgetown, in accordance with the plans on file in the office of the engineer commissioner of the District of Columbia.

No amendment was offered.

Section 2 was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. The notice for proposals shall be given and contracts for the construction of said sewers made in the manner now provided by law in cases of building new sewers in the District of Columbia: Provided, That notice for proposals shall be given for thirty days; and, in addition to the newspapers in which notice is now required to be given, said notice shall also be given in one newspaper for thirty days in each of the cities of Chicago, Cincinnati, Saint Louis, Louisville, and Richmond.

No amendment was offered.

Section 3 was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of the aforesaid appropriation, for the construction of said sewers, in the manner now provided by law for similar work done in said District.

No amendment was offered.

Section 4 was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That 50 per cent. of the amounts so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrants of the commissioners of the District shall be charged to the said District, in the same manner that the cost of similar work is now charged: Provided, That the amount so charged to the District of Columbia shall be reimbursed to the United States, without interest, in annual installments of $50,000, commencing with the fiscal year of 1885 and 1886.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move to amend the section just read, in line 7, by striking out the word "without" and inserting the word "with," before the word "interest;" also by inserting, after the word "interest," the words "at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum;" so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That the amount so charged to the District of Columbia shall be reimbursed to the United States, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, in annual installments of $50,000, commencing with the fiscal year of 1885 and 1886.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think that amendment will be of any value, notwithstanding the high respect I have for the judgment of my friend from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] who submits it. I feel quite confident from our experience since this extraordinary movement was entered upon in this District in 1870 that this money never will be refunded to the Treasury of the United States, that Congress will not increase the rate of taxation here unless it is done in connection with the subject-matter itself.

If it is really the intention of the Committee of the Whole that this money shall be refunded, the refunding of it must be provided for at the very outset; the change of law required to make the necessary assessments must be provided for now. Ever since that unexampled period of corruption which occurred here, covering the years 1872, 1873, and 1874, when this enormous debt was piled up which we are now paying, and one-half of which is undoubtedly without any just foundation—ever since then every measure like this has been found ineffectual, for the reason that the amount of levy now made barely meets the current expenses of the District.

Therefore, for the purpose of trying to meet this emergency, and if necessary to secure the construction of this sewer which gentlemen seem to suppose should be promptly done, I offer a substitute for the proviso of section 4. Before it is read I wish to say that the most healthy city in the country, before this experiment was tried in the District, was Washington city. I myself resided here with my family for fourteen years, in that part of the city which is said now to be unhealthy, without any case of sickness occurring in it. Malaria was not then known, and the universal healthfulness of the city was a matter that did not admit of dispute or discussion. It is only since the drafts upon your Treasury have become so enormous and rapid that the health of this city must be provided for by expenditures out of the public Treasury.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Does the gentleman think that because this city has been improved it has become more unhealthy?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not say that.

Mr. SPRIGGS. You say that it used to be more healthy than it is now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it a healthy city now, a remarkably healthy city; and it was a model of healthfulness a few years ago.

Mr. SPRIGGS. Does the gentleman think that the drafts on the Treasury have caused malaria here?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that the drafts on the Treasury are based on malaria. But I ask the Clerk to read the substitute which I propose to the proviso of section 4 of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the commissioners are hereby authorized to add to the rate of taxation on the assessment of the property of the District a per cent. sufficient to meet the expenditures on behalf of the District authorized by this act; and the current cost of said work shall be paid in equal parts by the District and the United States: Provided, That said commissioners may postpone the commencement of said work for such time as they shall deem expedient.

Mr. HOLMAN. The reason why I put on that last clause is that the District might not be prepared to pay its proportion at once, and it should be left discretionary with the commissioners when to begin work.

Mr. SPRIGGS. There is no objection to the first part of the substitute.

Mr. SHELLEY. I would be willing to accept the first part, authorizing an assessment on the property of the District to pay its part of the cost of this work in annual installments. I am informed by the District commissioners that the $50,000 which will be required to be paid annually under this bill can be paid out of the revenues of the District as they come in now without any injury to the other interests that are committed to their charge.

Mr. BLOUNT. In this connection I desire to call attention to this provision of the organic act of the District:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempted by law, and on personal property not taxable elsewhere $1.50 on every hundred dollars, according to the cash value thereof.

I wish to know if the amendment proposed will increase the rate of taxation authorized by the provision I have read?

Mr. SHELLEY. I suppose it will take the place of that provision so far as this special assessment is concerned.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman does not meet my point. I have read the general provision of the organic law of the District.

Mr. SHELLEY. That is for general purposes.

Mr. BLOUNT. But there is no exception here; the provision is general. I will read it again:

Provided, That the rate of taxation in any one year shall not exceed $1.50 on every $100 of real estate not exempted by law, and on personal property not taxable elsewhere $1.50 on every $100, according to the cash value thereof.

I ask my friend whether this amendment will necessitate an amendment of the organic law or whether that will be its effect?

Mr. SHELLEY. If the amendment be adopted, it would be a provision for this special appropriation.

Mr. BLOUNT. My friend does not catch the point of my inquiry. Has the rate of taxation in this District now reached the point of $1.50 on the $100?

Mr. SHELLEY. It has.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then this provision will have the effect to change the organic law and authorize a larger rate of taxation than the organic law now allows.

Mr. SHELLEY. That would be the effect of it. But, Mr. Chairman, the increased assessment will not be necessary. The District commissioners say that the annual revenues at the present rate of taxation will enable them to pay this money back at the rate of $50,000 a year. As the money raised by taxation must be paid into the Treasury of the United States, it can not get out of the Treasury except by act of Congress; therefore there is no danger that the revenues of the District will not be appropriated to the payment of this debt.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY].

Mr. BLOUNT. I wish to say a word further.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I submit that this provision of the organic law limiting the rate of taxation is a conservative one. It was deliberately agreed upon by Congress, and was intended to protect the tax-payers of this District. It was intended to prevent extravagant appropriations.

This provision that the rate of taxation upon real estate and personal property should not in any event exceed $1.50 on every $100 was probably adopted deliberately in the light of the records of this District with reference to the waste of public funds, in the light of the enormous debt which had been created, running from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000. Now, I ask whether, in view of the history of affairs in this District, it is not right that we should pause before adopting this departure from the organic act?

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend certainly perceives, from the drift of opinion expressed here, a determination to pass this measure in some form. He knows that the present rate of taxation in this District, 1½ per cent., is the lowest known in any city in the United States; is not up to the average rate of taxation in one-half the cities of this Union. Unless a provision of this kind be adopted there will be no money to meet the current expenses of this city, unless you provide for them out of the public Treasury.

Mr. BLOUNT. I will not assume, as the gentleman from Indiana assumes, that this House intends to violate this organic law of the District. I will not help to do it. I will not by my vote grant one single dollar to be taxed upon the people of this District beyond the restraining provision of this organic act. If the House sees fit to pass such a provision, of course it has the power; but if you do it in one instance you will have set a precedent. It will be argued, as it has been to-day, that the organic act has no restraining influence upon this House. I do hope that this Committee of the Whole will not adopt this provision changing the limitation of the organic act, and will not abandon the rules of this House in reference to appropriations for this District.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY], which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7 of section 4 strike out "without interest" and insert "with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum;" so that the proviso will read:

"Provided, That the amount so charged to the District of Columbia shall be reimbursed to the United States, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum in annual installments of $50,000, commencing with the fiscal year of 1885 and 1886."

The amendment was agreed to; there being—ayes 78, noes 1.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read my amendment as I have now modified it.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 of section 4 strike out "charged to" and insert "paid out of the funds of."

In line 5 strike out "charged" and insert "paid."

Strike out the proviso and insert the following:

"And the commissioners are hereby authorized to add to the rate of taxation on the assessment of the property of the District a per cent. sufficient to meet the expenditure on behalf of the District authorized by this act; and the current cost of the said work shall be paid in equal portions by the District and the United States: Provided, That said commissioners may postpone the commencement of said work to such time as they deem expedient."

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the Clerk to read the section as it will stand if my amendment be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That 50 per cent. of the amounts so paid by the Secretary of the Treasury upon the warrants of the commissioners of the District shall be paid out of the funds of the said District, in the same manner that the cost of similar work is now paid. And the commissioners are hereby authorized to add to the rate of taxation on the assessment of the property of the District a per cent. sufficient to meet the expenditure on behalf of the District authorized by this act; and the current cost of the said work shall be paid in equal portions by the District and the United States: Provided, That said commissioners may postpone the commencement of said work to such time as they deem expedient.

Mr. SHELLEY. Is not the amendment as just read subject to a point of order?

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to know what the point of order is.

Mr. SHELLEY. That the amendment changes existing law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Clause 3 of Rule XXI has no relation to a bill of this kind. This is not one of the general appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress. Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill: Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee having jurisdiction of the subject-matter of such amendment, which amendment being germane to the subject-matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Chair will perceive that applies only to general appropriation bills, of which there are thirteen.

Mr. BLAND. It retrenches the expenditures of the Government; that is to say, the amount of money taken out of the public Treasury will be reduced by this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment, and I do so on the ground I think it is entirely unnecessary. As I understand the facts of the case, the current revenues of the District of Columbia from the present rate of taxation as now prescribed of one dollar and a half on the hundred dollars of taxable property afford sufficient amount for the payment of the annual installments of this advanced money as they shall accrue. That, I understand, is the information given to the Committee on the District of Columbia by the District commissioners, that they can set apart out of the current revenues at the present rate of taxation annually the amount provided to be reimbursed the Government for its advance for the construction and completion of this system of sewers.

I understand the only reason why it is proposed to appropriate the sum of $500,000 now instead of spending $50,000 or $100,000 annually in the construction of the system is that the work can be done far more cheaply and far more efficiently by making one contract of it than by spreading it over five or six years and completing it in detail.

That is one reason, to save money to the Government and the District; and the other reason is that the health of the city, which will be improved, requires the immediate construction of this system of sewerage.

Mr. BLAND. Do you expect to expend the whole of that half million of dollars in one year?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I have no doubt the commissioners, if the system be adopted, will carry it forward as rapidly as possible.

Mr. BLAND. Do you expect it can be done in one year?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I suppose it can be done during this year. We believe it ought to be done within the year. The only reasons the Government is asked to advance the money are those that I have already stated, and the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana is not necessary, because the amount requisite to meet these annual installments and accrued interest on them can be realized out of the current rates of taxation in the District.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am quite certain from what has been shown in the Committee on Appropriations the gentleman is laboring under a mistake, and that this money will have to be collected in this way or it will never be collected at all. I suggest he insert the words "if they shall find it necessary to enable the District to meet its portion of such expenditure." Has my friend any objection to that?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I do not think it is necessary to do that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is my friend opposed to saving the public money?

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I do not differ with my friend on that point. I listen to him always with respect and very often agree with him in the views he expresses. But, sir, I was merely going to say that the money collected from taxes in this District is paid into the Treasury of the United States and is appropriated from the Treasury by acts of Congress. Now, if it is necessary there might be added to the fourth section a provision of this character, which I think will meet the views of the gentleman from Indiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MULDROW obtained the floor and yielded to Mr. WILSON.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I was simply going to say that it seems to me the objections of the gentleman from Indiana can be met by a simple proviso in this form:

And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to set apart and cover into the Treasury, out of the taxes of the District of Columbia paid into the Treasury under the provisions of existing law, the said several installments, with interest, as they shall become due to the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, I will say that the very commissioners of this District have found it necessary to resort to a cheese-paring process, if you please, as it is frequently termed on this floor, with reference to your charitable institutions even. Your very charities in this District are being narrowed to meet the necessities of the District upon the present basis of taxation—1½ per cent.; and the contest, the gentleman will find sooner or later, on this floor will be whether or not you shall give support to charities which belong distinctly to the District of Columbia out of the public Treasury. One and one-half per cent. on the assessed value of property is no tax for a city like this, which is one of the wealthiest in proportion to its numbers in the country. The most of the cities throughout the country pay from 3 to 4½ per cent.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. But I think my friend from Indiana will find that the District of Columbia is now annually expending on the sewerage system more than is required to pay back the annual installments of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, if they are not called upon to make the assessments then of course they will not make it. If it is necessary to make the assessments they ought have the privilege.

Mr. BLAND. I move to strike out the last word.

If the present revenues of the District of Columbia will meet the demands of the bill without the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, the amendment hurts no one, but if gentlemen are mistaken as to the extent of the revenues, then the amendment, I think, is a very important one.

But the bill seems to me a very extraordinary one in many respects. I do not know, sir, why it is that the Government of the United States should be called upon to loan this money to any one when it is itself so largely in debt.

I know there is a sort of popular sentiment now existing that we have an immense surplus of revenue in the Treasury. It is a debauching and dishonest sentiment; for no government has a surplus of revenue that has over one and a half billion of dollars of indebtedness to meet more than its revenue. Two hundred millions of dollars to-day is due, and it is a duty, Mr. Chairman, to pay that money out on the public debt; and when the Government does that there is no surplus revenue left to loan to anybody. I do not see why the government of the District of Columbia should not improve its own sewers like other cities, and do so gradually and annually as it is able to do it. If the people of this District are not in a condition to expend over $50,000 annually in improving sewers, what right have they to demand that Congress will spend a half million for that purpose, and lend it to them without interest? None whatever, sir.

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that the work for which this half million of dollars is proposed to be appropriated by this act is to be let out I suppose under one contract. Some individual is to make a big sum of money out of it. That would seem to be at all events the possibilities of the bill.

Mr. SHAW. Some other Shepherd will turn up.

Mr. BLAND. I do not suppose that Shepherd will turn up again, as he is a long distance away from Washington at this time. But why can not $50,000 be appropriated from the revenues of the District of Columbia under the provisions of existing law and the same amount from the Government, and then if it is necessary to let out several contracts to different contractors it ought to be done, and it may be done cheaper next year than this. Certainly there are poor men in this country and in this District who could take a small contract who could not take a contract involving half a million of dollars.

In the first place, I say it is not just to the tax-payers of this Union. It is not just to this Government. This Government is not out of debt. It has more debts to pay to-day than it has money to meet its obligations with, and it had better meet these debts, and should meet them, before it talks about loaning money to the District of Columbia in this way. Nor is it good policy to appropriate half a million of dollars in this manner and in one amount. You do not expect to expend it in less than four or five years, the time given to the District of Columbia in which to refund the money.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VANCE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and pending that motion, I move that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto be limited to one minute.

The motion to limit debate was agreed to.

The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. VANCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House in Committee of the Whole resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6526). By order of the House all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto is limited to one minute.

Mr. HOLMAN. I desire to modify the proposition I have submitted by inserting after the word "commissioners" the words "if they shall deem it necessary to enable the District to meet its portion of said expenditure." I ask the Clerk to read the amendment as thus modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the commissioners, if they shall deem it necessary to enable the District to meet its portion of said expenditure, are hereby authorized to add to the rate of taxation on the assessment of the property of the District a per cent. sufficient to meet the expenditures on behalf of the District authorized by this act, and the current cost of the said work shall be paid in equal portions by the District and the United States: Provided, That said commissioners may postpone the commencement of said work till such time as they may deem expedient.

Mr. MULDROW. I ask for a vote now on the amendment.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment as modified, there were—ayes 34, noes 44.

Mr. HOLMAN. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MULDROW] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN].

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 60.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I still insist on the point that a quorum has not voted.

Mr. MULDROW. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will not insist on a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; this is a large sum of money.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the figures to be reported by the tellers are changed I will not insist.

The count was resumed, and the tellers reported—ayes 61, noes 61.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. MULDROW. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. VANCE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6526) making an appropriation for the completion of the sewerage system of the District of Columbia, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRAIRIE COUNTY, ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. DUNN, by unanimous consent, the papers in the case of the claim of Prairie County, Arkansas, were taken from the files of the House and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JOHNSON, for ten days from this date, on account of important business.

To Mr. WHITE, of Kentucky, for ten days after to-day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MITCHELL, for three days from April 28, on account of important business.

To Mr. PARKER, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BARR, until May 8.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I move that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes for debate only on the tariff bill, under the order of the House requiring a recess from 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock?

Mr. WELLER. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCMILLIN, will preside at the evening session as Speaker pro tempore.

The House accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, at 8 o'clock p. m., was called to order by Mr. MCMILLIN as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The business before the House is limited by order to debate only on revenue bills.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. MATSON in the chair.

THE TARIFF.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for debate only upon the tariff bill. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor. He has forty-five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States are not opposed to paying a tax to support the Government, to pay its debts, and to provide for the general welfare. But they are opposed, or at least a portion of them are, to paying heavy war taxes for the purpose of supporting and making immensely rich the manufacturing classes in the community.

The provision, sir, in the Constitution of the United States to provide for the general welfare does not mean and can not mean to tax one class of men, or in fact the whole community, for the purpose of benefiting a few. The general welfare is a good expression, placed in our Constitution for noble and grand purposes. It is the only charitable thing that is attached to that grand instrument. Our fathers in their wisdom foresaw that it would be necessary, by tariff or otherwise, laid upon foreign importations, to provide for supporting the Government and to provide for every emergency, for foreign war or for domestic war; to provide for everything that could be imagined that the passions of the people or the vindication of great rights might bring upon this people.

They foresaw further that it would sometimes become necessary to protect a single individual at home when cast into a dungeon; that Congress should provide a remedy by habeas corpus for his delivery, or when oppressed in a foreign land, that Congress should have the means under the general-welfare clause to protect him and do him good. They went further: they foresaw that the time would come when the poor and indigent and oppressed people would need the material aid of the Government, and they in their wisdom provided for that. That is what the general-welfare clause means.

It never did mean and never can mean oppression; welfare does not mean oppression. It never did mean unjust and unequal and burdensome taxes to make a few rich; that is not welfare. It never meant in any shape anything that would do harm. Its meaning is good; to promote happiness, security, and prosperity; to relieve the distressed; to comfort those that are in circumstances where they need comfort. These are the only charitable words that are thrown into our Constitution. They were put there by the wisdom of our forefathers, who foresaw every emergency that would come up.

I have said that they never intended that taxes should be collected from the people to be put into the pockets of the favored few. Under our present tariff law, which is a violation of every principle of right and justice and every principle that obtains in the Constitution that secures our liberty and vindicates our want, men, contrary to their will, poor men who can not spare the money, laboring men who have to labor for their livelihood, are compelled to put into the pockets of the manufacturers $5 where one goes into the Treasury of the United States. This is exceedingly oppressive, and considering the vast amount of manufactured articles that are in the United States it becomes very oppressive, very burdensome, more than human nature can stand, and more than it ought to bear.

I advocate this bill because it will relieve part of the distress that is brought upon the people by this unjust taxation. But I go further; I desire to see the day come when the whole thing will be reversed; when we will go further than this bill goes and have a tariff purely for revenue, and revenue alone; when we will change the matter so as to charge a small tax upon every article that comes from abroad, and in that way fill our Treasury to overflowing. For that will do it. When you open the doors to the commerce of the world and lay a small tribute upon it, I say it will fill our Treasury in abundance.

I want to see the day come when by wise legislation we will change the figures and let $5 go into the Treasury from the tariff where one goes into the pockets of the manufacturers. That would be just. When you have a tariff at all you must have some protection. I do not care whether you call it incidental protection, or what kind of protection you call it, it is a protection in that sense.

But it is a great relief to the people to take these burdens from them. I have heard gentlemen say here, learned gentlemen, with long faces and solemn countenances, "Oh, you must not reduce the tariff as you Democrats talk of reducing it, for if you do you will open the floodgates of all the world and goods will pour in here and become so cheap that they will break down all our manufactures, and will put out the fires of our furnaces." More than one gentleman has very earnestly appealed to Congress not to let cheap goods come in here. In Heaven's name, I do not care how cheap they are if I have to buy, and the poor people of the country do not care.

These same men make another argument that astonishes me. They urge with great zeal that you should not let foreign goods come in here and make goods cheap, as if that was not what the people want. They tell you that there has been overproduction in all the manufacturing industries not only in the United States, but all over the world.

Now, in the first place, what does that mean? That means that there is so much money made by manufacturing that all the capital that can get a chance to be invested in it goes there. But they have made so much, have produced so many goods, that they tell you they can not sell them. But I have not heard one of these distinguished gentlemen have the bravery, for I do call it moral bravery, to tell the truth and let the people know the whole truth about it, and say that they want to hold England off, that they want to hold the whole world off until we can sell our overproduction here, for if their overproduction comes here it will make goods so cheap that we can not sell our overproduction.

The people want cheap goods; they desire them. If you will let the overproduction of the world come in here, I do not care how cheap it makes them, you will please the people, and in the full meaning and true intent and spirit of the Constitution execute that portion of it which says "provide for the general welfare of the people." This will be providing for the general welfare by bringing them cheap goods.

There are to-day in the United States many millions of ragged, dirty, ignorant children that are oppressed by the tariff and crushed almost to death. The people would shout for joy if they could hear that cheap goods were coming here so that they could be dressed decently and made to feel their manhood and their strength. Many a mother's heart would leap with joy to see the father of the family and the children able to purchase goods to make them comfortable and enable them to enjoy life.

Do not talk to me about its being a curse upon this nation to have cheap goods. I say the whole country would rejoice. And in thus supplying cheap goods you would not put out your furnaces; you would not destroy anybody's rights or interfere with anybody's just interests. In my heart and soul I do believe it will reduce the price of goods one-half when you bring down the tariff to what it really ought to be—when you bring it down so as to put only a small tax upon every article of high price or low, according to the value. And when that day comes the poor people of the country for once in their lives will not only have the privilege of buying where they can buy cheapest, but they will have the pleasure of buying the best, the most beautiful. The poor mothers and fathers of the land will have the great joy of seeing their children arrayed in beauty.

And, sir, there will be another effect. It will rouse the pride of the rising generation. I am talking now with reference to the interests of the poor. It is the poor whose cause I plead; it is the poor for whom I propose to legislate. The rich men can take care of themselves. I say that when you have thus reduced the price of everything that would make life comfortable—when you have enabled the families of the humble classes to supply themselves with everything to eat and everything to wear and everything beautiful with which to adorn themselves, you will cause a thrill of gladness in the proud heart of the boy who has been oppressed by poverty, who has been dragging a life of wretchedness and rags, thinking, "I am of no good upon earth; there is no hope, no promise for me; there is no chance for me to lift myself up. It is true that our institutions give merit, industry, and intelligence the right to rise; but I can not rise; I am oppressed; I am borne down forever." But reduce this unjust, this wicked, and I will say this robber tariff to what it ought to be, and you will give new life to the whole country.

But gentlemen say, "If you reduce the tariff and bring down the price of goods, you stop our manufactures." You ought to tell the truth to the people and say candidly, "We want to prevent goods coming here from abroad until we can cheat the people by making them buy what we have overproduced." Why, gentlemen, it was your own judgment that made you produce more than was necessary for the supply of the country; and you ought to abide the consequences of your judgment; you are rich enough to do so.

But you say, "It will put out our furnaces." When gentlemen talk so loudly and eloquently and look so solemn over this question of putting out the furnaces it reminds me of the worm that never dies and of the fire that is never quenched—the worm that feeds upon the life-blood of the poor laboring people of this country; the fire that burns the flesh of the needy and crushes them down forever. I want to put out such furnaces as that. Do you not want to do the same? I ask every patriot, do you not want such furnaces as those put out? You will not put out the righteous furnace; you will not put out a furnace that is kept alive by honest labor and by the honest use of capital in order to fill up the country and make it happy. No such furnace as that will be put out.

As I have said, I propose to demonstrate not only that to reduce the tariff to what it ought to be would relieve the poor and make the people happy, but that instead of diminishing the price of labor it would increase it. I wish to call the attention of the committee a few minutes while I undertake to prove this proposition.

Why should a fair and just reduction of the tariff stop manufactures? Why should it reduce the price of labor? Before undertaking to prove that such a measure will increase the price of labor I will advert for a moment to what has been said by a dozen or more speakers on our side in the way of demonstration that even if wages be reduced the working people will be able to buy goods so much cheaper that their wages will do them more good. But the advantages of reducing the tariff will make themselves felt with double force when it is realized that it will increase the price of labor.

Now, after reducing the tariff, what is necessary to increase the price of labor? In the first place we want to build ships enough to carry the commerce of the world. I am supposing that you have reduced the tariff so as to invite cheap goods of all the world to come to our soil, that they may be purchased by our people at such prices as they have never enjoyed before. When you have done that you have to build ships. What a vast amount of labor it will take for years to come to build ships enough to float the commerce that will come from abroad to our shores, to put this carrying trade under the protection of our flag. This is one way in which laborers will get increased prices for their labor. More laborers will be demanded; more ships will be needed.

But, sir, I go further and say that when you have reduced the tariff, though you have gone great lengths in the proper direction, you have not gone far enough. Wise legislators, after reducing the tariff, ought to provide a home for every poor man upon the vast domain of the United States. But think of it! Give them good and cheap goods so they can live on this domain of the public lands and support their families. Then there is a vast body of laborers which will come in and enjoy the results of this beneficent system. It must be a system, one and complete. It must be one general, coherent, and satisfactory system. It must not be singular, exceptional, and unfair. It must be a general reduction of the tariff in favor of the general welfare. The Constitution must shine out in all its beauty and strength. It must be a minister of mercy, an angel of consolation and peace.

You must encourage all the men of the country to go out and settle upon the lands and cultivate farms. Let them build houses in waste places. To do this they require lumber. That is another vast branch of industry, and it will repay the laborer abundantly. The new settlers need more lumber, and they must have it. This bill puts lumber on the free-list and relieves it of taxation, and that is only right and proper.

There are, too, vast ore deposits in the earth which ought to be dug up. That is another productive field where labor can be employed. These laborers need not be engaged in raising wheat or corn or cattle or any other food product. Let them dig up the iron, copper, gold, silver, lead, and other ores. Let them dig it all up, and let them thereby infuse new life and vigor into all industrial pursuits. It will come like the voice of salvation into the hearts of the people, and the amount of happiness which will result can only be measured by the genuine rejoicing of the people. [Applause.] The people will rise and the nation will rise to additional energy and strength and to greater glory. Industry will thrive, laborers will go to work, and we shall have that prosperity which all must desire.

But that is not all. Railroads will have to be built, for the removal of heavy exactions from the people will increase the extent of our productions and more railroads will be required to carry them everywhere.

You will have to build more ships. The building of railroads and ships will require more iron and more steel and more lumber and more labor.

But that is not all you want. The Lord only knows how many railroads and how many ships you will need to carry the cheap and abundant commerce which will come in with a reduction of the tariff. When that commerce shall grow up it will put to work numberless laborers. It will find the ways and means to spread itself over the face of the earth.

No man can tell how many railroads we will need. They will be built all over the country. If capital no longer finds that good investment in manufactures which it now does it will be put into the construction of railroads. It will go wherever it can make good profit.

Thus the laborer on the farm and in the field and in the mines and everywhere else will find remunerative employment. Corn and wheat, beef and pork, iron and steel, all will find a ready market.

This country surpasses all others in the production of fruits which the world wants. Every kind can be raised here, and their production will give employment to a large number of laboring people.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we shall need our water communications improved and our river navigation opened up. It will bring about competition, and while it will afford cheap transportation it will also give employment to another large branch of industry.

As the nation rises in glory, in beauty, in kindness, in prosperity, in trade, in commerce, in labor, in liberty, men from every clime will come in to help us.

I am not talking about pauper labor; I am talking of honest and helpful labor which will come in and rejoice with us and help and be helped, so that the beneficent effect will be common to them and to us.

By the time you have opened up all your rivers and improved all your harbors, dug out all your canals, built all your railroads, given transportation to all your commerce, you will have labor enough for all your wants for ages to come. That is what you want to-day in place of the system of tariff monopolies, which make the rich richer and the poor poorer. We shall have honesty and decency right along. When my Republican friends come to realize the benefits which will accrue they will wonder the system was not adopted long ago. Instead of the one-hundredth or the one-tenth of our resources being developed we will have them producing good results in all directions.

When we open the door to every enterprise and encourage every energy of our people, what will be the result? If the laboring man can not get good wages in manufacturing he can get it in the mines, he can get it in clearing out rivers, he can get it on the railroads, and it will increase the demand for labor; and in the end the manufacturers will have to do just this, what they have never done, that is, divide their profits with the laborers and increase the wages of labor.

Mr. SHAW. That will be a good divide.

Mr. WOLFORD. That is what they ought to do. That is what they will have to do in the end. But if you permit them to go on under the operation of this iniquitous system, by which they can pile up their own capital and crush down and tread under foot the laboring people, the cupidity of man will never let them do it. They will hold labor down with heavy heel while they have such unjust power over it. You never knew a man to grow rich that he did not want to grow richer. You never knew a man to become richer that he did not become more vicious. Did you ever hear of a man who was so rich that he did not want to be richer? Did you ever hear of one so rich that he did not want to oppress his dependents? I have never heard of one or read of one, and God knows I have never seen one. Now, I have laid down a plan that I think will satisfy any gentleman that works it out. Of course I do not intend to go into all the minutiæ or all the details in a short speech of three-quarters of an hour of how it is all to be done, but I lay down the principles and you can apply them.

But another thing: that is not all that will be accomplished by the reduction of these enormous taxes. You will revive the arts and the sciences. Meeting-houses will be built all over the land; colleges will spring up; churches will everywhere be erected; and not only will the homes of our people be beautified and made happy, but there will be created a demand for ornaments, works in precious metal, workmen will be in demand in the fine arts, in all things that will please the eye and gratify the taste and enlighten and cultivate the minds of a great and happy and prosperous people, and that will establish a demand for thousands of laborers in those various arts. Talk of the schoolmasters and schoolmistresses! Why, it will give a new impetus to education. It will create a new demand for their services by putting into the minds of the people a desire to read and to be great. I talk now, Mr. Chairman, of those who have been downtrodden and oppressed. I speak of the poor people of this country in whose minds will be created a desire for education, and with education comes the taste for art and all those little things that adorn and beautify life.

All these things will increase the demand for schools. The teachers will find employment, and you will have another vast army to feed and clothe, and who will be the guardians of the morality and the education and the culture of the nation. The intellect of the people will grow. You need not tell me—for I said the other evening I was in favor of national aid to schools—you need not tell me, I say, that this change will not be of service in that direction. I am in favor of the educational bill; I am in favor of that which will aid in exterminating illiteracy in our land. I am in favor of the parental aid; in favor of State aid and the aid of our counties to the cause of education; and why in God's name and the general-welfare clause can not this great Government aid in the education of our own people? We have a government unlike any other upon earth.

Every citizen of every State—and you need not talk to me of State rights; it is a humbug and a delusion when you come to such a thing as that—I say, then, that we have a Government unlike every other government on God's green earth. Every male child that is born in the United States is a citizen of two governments—a citizen of the State in which he lives; and it is the duty of that State to educate him. If you would have intelligent voters, intelligent citizens, intelligent neighbors, if you would have a great country, if you would have men great in the arts and literature, it is a necessity that you educate them. And then also they are citizens of the United States. Has the Government of the United States no feeling or care for the citizens? In mercy's name, will you tell me that if a great and kind and benevolent—for our Government is in one sense, although my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania some weeks ago said it was not, an eleemosynary institution—I say it is, in the grandest, noblest, and highest sense of the word, an eleemosynary institution. It is a vast charitable institution, in which every citizen has an equal interest.

It is a power that protects and defends. It is a government in which every man has an interest. It is a government in which there are none but citizens, and no man has a right to oppress or make his fellow-man afraid. Neither have the State governments the right to do so. It is the honor and glory of the citizen that all the Government is our own. I do not talk now of the governments of other countries; I do not talk of despotisms; I am not talking of monarchies; but I am talking of a great, enlightened, and free and prosperous people, where every man is lord, where every man is master of the situation, where every man is a citizen in the highest, the noblest, and the best sense of that term in his duty to the Government and in the reciprocal duty of the Government to him.

But now I think I have brought classes enough to the mind of every gentleman, and I do not propose to go into particulars, but allow you to cipher out the plan for yourself on the mere basis of the suggestions I make. I assert, and experience will prove the truth of the assertion, that whenever the day comes, as God grant it may soon come, when your tariff is adjusted as I have indicated, the light of happiness and prosperity will beam upon this nation with a brilliancy and splendor that will surpass all that we have known in our past history. Some day it will be done. I am old, and may not live to see it in all its fullness and glory, but young men will see it and bless the men that called it into being. When you have done it, all the nation will rejoice, and the bowed head of labor will rise and rejoice. When you have done it you will have brought glory and wealth and honor to the nation; you will have lightened the burdens of labor. Take the man who is unable under your present oppressive tariff to buy his family decent clothes, make him able to adorn them, and he will gladly avail himself of the opportunity, and fill their hearts with gladness, their homes with happiness; for his pride and honor and the honor of the nation will make him do it.

But when you have done all this you have only begun the grand work of reformation; for this is a reformation—this Morrison bill. It will prove to be so before this century is completed; for, whether you stifle it in this Congress or not, it will pass. It is founded upon the eternal principles of right; it is founded upon truth itself and it will triumph. I go further. I say this Morrison bill will be hailed by a future generation as the harbinger of freedom—I mean the harbinger of freedom in its purest sense, a condition of freedom in which every man may assert his manhood and every lady her ladyhood; when the poor man's daughter under the system I am talking about can learn music, can learn all the arts and sciences; when she can cultivate polish of mind as well as the rich man's daughter. She may never be the equal of the rich man's daughter in wealth; but in that which is greater than wealth, in the ornaments of the mind, in the beauty of the soul, in the finer feelings of the nature, she will be her peer; and the world will come to recognize that superiority in refinement, in intellect, in beauty of mind is the superiority which triumphs; that riches are only pelf and trash and count for nothing before an intelligent people.

In the name of a great nation I ask why there should be a distinction between the rich and the poor. Give facilities for educating all alike and all will want to be educated. Even if you were not to vote the money, when you have once freed those illiterate classes and given them a chance to live, in the end they will educate themselves. I say in the end they will all be educated.

But it will do more than that, for that is only the beginning. When it opens all these vast forests of ours and makes the wilderness blossom like the rose and the solitary places to be glad—when it has done all that it has not yet done all. But it will ultimately unite the whole of this nation in the bands of a common brotherhood.

Do not talk to me about building a wall around this country and making a brotherhood by force. When you put them on a common footing of equal rights they will be a brotherhood by love and by sympathy. The rich man will need the poor man, and the poor man will need the rich man's money. They will be a band of brothers all marching to the same great end, all engaged in the same great fight of overcoming the obstacles of humanity and accomplishing the highest and noblest civilization based upon the foundation of American freedom. When they find themselves united in that they strike hands together as a band of brothers joined together by the eternal principles of interest and love, and there will be no more quarreling. But when you undertake to make a man work like a dog for another and only get kicks, his soul becomes discontented, and it ought to become discontented. That is the natural result.

But pursue the course you are now pursuing and you will have all sorts of strife and bloodshed and all sorts of attempts at revolution. Every bad and hateful passion of the human heart will be brought into play. Pursue the course I have indicated in these remarks, and all the noble feelings of the human heart and all the finer emotions of the human soul will be called into play, and malice and hatred and unjust distinctions will vanish; and the people will be one people moving on to one great goal. Now, is not that a beautiful picture? And it will be realized. It must be. The kingdoms of this world never can become the kingdoms of the Lord and of His Christ until you begin in just such a way as this and accomplish the work in this manner.

When you have done this you have only begun. Trading with all the nations of the earth you come to learn that those you have prejudices against are not as bad as you thought they were. It breaks down the prejudices of nations. It breaks down the distinctions between peoples. No man will be a foreigner to you when you have the commerce of the whole world coming here and you and your tradesmen are going there and your intercourse one with another is of every-day occurrence. The world will become a great band, a great brotherhood. And when the world looks on at the glory of America rising in her manhood and her power and her strength, then they will say, "Behold what freedom can do!" Free thoughts, free speech, a free press, and free trade—trade with all the world—that is what is wanted to make a nation happy and glorious and great.

When I say free trade I mean in a comparative sense, so that you will be free to trade with all the world. Do that and you will be happy and great, and kings will abdicate their thrones; or if they do not the people of the Old World, seeing what a great people you are, not quarreling, one not trying to oppress another or trying to make him unhappy or miserable, will admire the spectacle and will quote the language of Burns when he said—

> Man's inhumanity to man
> Makes countless thousands mourn.

And they will begin to say: "We want no tyrants in our lands, we want no inhumanity; we want no man that will crush us to the earth and starve our children and not even give us leave to work to support our families."

Rising in their manhood and in their power there will be a glory and a dignity, a beauty and a power in human nature, that will transcend even the imagination of the most enthusiastic. It will hurl them from their thrones if they do not change their course, and the world will become free and great and happy. Everything that can make a man happy and good, beautiful and grand, will be brought into the world.

If my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was here to-night I would tell him this was the way to redeem those poor beasts that he saw in London. And I want to talk just a minute about that. More than one of the orators upon the other side—and it is strange how eloquent and educated men can make the worst side appear the better and the black appear the white—I say it is strange that more than one of them has invited your attention to the pauper labor of Europe. They tell you that they make trace-chains and make women work on them. But they do not tell you all; there is more than that. I have seen women work in America, and they were proud to work; they were not ashamed to work if necessity required it.

But they say that women make trace-chains there, and Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, told my friend and colleague Mr. TURNER that they sold trace-chains here for 65 cents and they sold them for 80 cents in England. No wonder, if they have such a hard time making them. Is it not strange that they are afraid to allow English trace-chains to come here for fear of breaking down American trace-chains when they are so cheap here?

It is a contradiction of terms, and any one who can strip the disguise from their statements can see that it was a falsehood fabricated for the occasion. I do not say that members of Congress would fabricate anything, but they have suffered themselves to be made the dupes of crafty men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOLFORD. My subject is not exhausted yet. I ask leave to print another speech; I will not take this and revise it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman printing the remainder of his remarks?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman wants to print another speech. This one is too good to leave out; I want him to print this one.

Mr. WOLFORD. Oh, they are taking this down and will print it.

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I propose to state in as brief a manner as I can the reasons that govern my actions on this bill. It might be inferred from the tone of debate on the bill under discussion that there were two parties here, one for absolute free trade and the other for absolute prohibition. Yet I take it there is no member in this body ready to avow himself for the one or the other.

The friends of this bill seek by it to ultimately secure a tariff for revenue only; its Republican opponents declare themselves protectionists for the sake of protection only. The former would make the imposition of customs duties simply a matter of revenue; the latter would make it simply a matter of protection. I accept neither theory, and belong to neither of the parties. Neither represents the true and real sentiments of the Democratic party, or the teachings of its greatest statesmen.

It is true that the bill before the House could be voted for by a Republican protectionist, and he could not in so doing be fairly charged with being either a free-trader or a revenue reformer. It is absurd to call the "Morrill tariff" of 1861, which is made the basis of the bill under consideration, either a free-trade or a revenue-tariff measure.

It is the unconcealed purpose lying back of this bill that gives tone and color to this discussion. Its author and its champions on this floor have very frankly declared that it is only the first step in the journey to a tariff for revenue only, and ultimately to free trade; that this particular bill, objectionable as it is to its framer and friends, is only an earnest of what is to come, a solemn pledge of something better in the near future, a half of a loaf which to them is better than no bread, as the only measure that can rally enough support in this Congress to secure for it any consideration. This measure would be rejected by its present friends with scorn if they had a majority here friendly to a more sweeping and comprehensive measure.

It is not what is in the bill that causes this discussion to be watched with intense interest, but what is not in it; not what it says on its face, but what is boldly threatened by its advocates that makes us pause. It is because of this menace to the interest, peace, and prosperity of the country that induced me to vote against the consideration of this bill, and when its consideration is ended will induce me to vote against its passage. The friends of this measure can not say that they have been forced into this position; they have voluntarily and recklessly assumed it, and they glory in the fact.

I do not, Mr. Chairman, belong to that school of economists who believe in protection simply for the sake of protection, nor to the party which believes in a tariff for revenue simply for the sake of revenue.

There have always been in the world two classes of men, the practical man and the theorist. The theoretical and practical are rarely found in a marked degree existing in the same person. When the mind once enters the realm of abstractions it forgets and ignores the tangible facts of human life. The worst foe to a mere abstraction or fancy is a stubborn, unyielding fact. Therefore the theorist likes to get away from facts and from the daily routine and experience of human existence. If the theorist finds some trouble, some fact that will not come within the law of his theory, he says, "So much the worse for the fact."

Political economy is a science based upon observation and experience. It does not and can not rank with the exact sciences; is not like the science of geometry, founded upon maxims and propositions universally and necessarily true and generally accepted, but is based upon human investigation of the daily affairs of life, where prejudice, passion, and ignorance come in and render correct deductions difficult. When we reflect that more than a century has passed since Adam Smith wrote his Wealth of Nations we are compelled to admit that the science of political economy has not achieved a high rank in the social sciences.

How many of its fundamental propositions, so called, are settled to-day? Scarcely any two writers on the science to-day are agreed on the definitions of rent, interest, wages, profit, value, wealth, or money.

One very recent and popular writer, Mr. Henry George, has attempted to overthrow the scientific notion of wages and rent, and another has attempted the same with interest. The one traces all our troubles to private ownership in land, the other to the interest allowed on the loan of money, both of which are denounced as robbery. Equally unsatisfactory has this science been when it has attempted to investigate the causes which produce prosperous times or hard times in our history. One scientist arbitrarily assumes that free trade was the cause, another says protection, another currency, and so on.

I have made these observations, Mr. Chairman, to discourage the recklessness which has characterized some of the friends of this bill, in their dogmatic assumptions and propositions which can not be admitted as self-evident, nay, which are unsupported by the facts of human experience.

As a specimen of these ex cathedra dogmatic statements, take the one that has been repeated twenty times in this debate—that the tariff adds to the price of the protected article a sum equal to the duty imposed; that the laboring man gets no benefit from the tariff; that the whole duty imposed on the domestic manufactures goes into the pocket of the manufacturer; that protection is a hinderance to the manufacturing interest of the country. All these assumptions have been refuted by facts.

Take the one that assumes that the tariff adds to the cost of the protected article a sum equal to the duty. The history of the manufactures of pig-iron and steel railway bars disproves the assertion. I select them as specimens for the reason that the duties on these two articles have excited as much debate as any other two items in the tariff schedule, and because my own State and district are largely interested in their production. The duty on pig-iron in 1846 was fixed at 30 per cent. ad valorem, and decreased in 1857 to 24 per cent. In 1861 it was fixed at $6 per ton; in 1864 increased to $9; in 1870 it was reduced to $7; in 1872 to $6.30; afterward raised to $7 again, and in 1883 reduced to three-tenths of 1 cent per pound, or $6.72 per ton.

Now, what are the facts? The average cost of pig-iron in the United States from 1850 to 1860—usually designated the free-trade decade in our history—was $26.47. The average cost in coin from 1870 to 1880, which may be called the protection decade, when there was more railroad building and a greater demand for iron than ever before, was $26.96, a difference of only 49 cents a ton. And to-day No. 1 foundery-iron is quoted at $20 per ton; No. 2 at $19; No. 3 gray forge at $17; mottled iron at $16, and white iron at $15, an average on the five grades in common use of $17.40. In this case was the amount of the duty added to the article, and by so much was its cost increased? Or did it have the effect of increasing competition between the home and foreign manufacturer of pig-iron, by which it was reduced in cost to the American consumer more than $9 per ton since 1860?

How stands the case with steel railway bars? The manufacture of steel rails under the Bessemer process was first undertaken in this country in 1864. Then we were paying in gold from $80 to $112 per ton for English steel rails. Our mills were not ready to receive orders till 1867, and then the price ranged from $72.50 to $77.50 in gold for English steel rails. In 1870 Congress imposed a duty of 1½ cents per pound, or $28 per ton, on steel railway bars, when English steel railway bars were selling in England in gold at $55 per ton. Ten years after our mills were prepared to receive orders the price fell to $40 per ton. In 1882, owing to the extraordinary demand for steel railway bars in this country, the price advanced to an average of $48.50 per ton for 1882. On the 1st of January, 1883, it fell to $40 a ton, and on the 1st of January, 1884, to $35, and the New York quotations to-day are from $33 to $34 per ton.

Again I ask, was the duty of $28 per ton in 1870, or of $17 per ton to which it was reduced in 1883, added to the cost to the consumer? Or did the competition between our home and foreign market, stimulated and encouraged by our duty, bring down the cost of steel railway bars from $58 in 1870 to $35 in 1884? The conclusion is irresistible. Ex uno disce omnes.

We should accept no proposition until experience, observation, and statistics warrant it.

Political parties have always differed on the tariff question. Even individuals of the same party differ, as we are pained to know. There is room for honest difference of opinion on the subject, for the reason that I have already given, that there are no absolute ultimate truths which every exact science must possess as a criterion. And our friends on the other side are no better off than we are. The power of the party lash and discipline have served to keep down discontent in this body, but the ablest journals in that party are as strong for this bill as Mr. MORRISON himself.

Here is the plank in the New York State convention platform on the tariff question:

IV. Its approval of that policy of protecting home industry from foreign competition which has through a century of national being encouraged immigration, rewarded labor, fostered enterprise, and assured unparalleled progress and prosperity, all variations from which policy have been the occasion of business confusion and disaster, and which, therefore, is alike justified in intelligence and by experience.

And here is the very terse editorial comment as found in the New York Times the day after the convention:

The resolution as to protection, so far as its meaning can be made out, is false in fact and mistaken in doctrine, and does not represent the convictions of the Republican party in the State.

When it is remembered, too, that the Times's candidate pulled through that convention, while Mr. Blaine, whose candidacy was so warmly espoused by the Tribune, the organ of the protectionists, was defeated, further comment is unnecessary.

If the tariff question were an open one; if we were just beginning to lay the foundation of some broad empire, and our national surroundings justified it, we would probably all be free-traders and in favor of the greatest possible commercial freedom. We are not living in such an age. We are not called upon to frame a code of laws for some new nation just commencing in history.

We are here in the westering sun of the nineteenth century, in a nation of 55,000,000 people, called upon to meet the demands of the "living present," and not to anticipate the wants of a coming century; we are living in an age when commercial rivalry and jealousy characterize every civilized nation on the globe. We are confronted with a policy that had its origin in the beginning of our Federal Government, and had the sanction of President Washington. To that system we are indebted for much of our marvelous prosperity and increase in all those things which constitute us a mighty continental nation. This system, coming down to us from our forefathers, is so embedded in the laws, habits, and thoughts of our people that it will not down at the bidding of any set of madcap theorists.

I am not now eulogizing a high proteetive tariff for the sole purpose of protection. I find no warrant for such a tariff in that clause of the Constitution which empowers Congress to lay and collect duties on imported goods and merchandise; if revenues were not needed to meet the obligations and expenses of the Government I could find no warrant in the Constitution for imposing them. But when the necessity arises for imposing duties I am as firmly of the opinion, independent of the practice of the Government for nearly one hundred years, that we have the constitutional right so to adjust them as to discriminate in favor of our home manufactures and home labor; not adjusted to foster monopolies, but to prevent them.

But my opinion may go for naught. The uniform practice of the Government has been either to make protection the primary object and revenue a mere incident, as it was in the tariffs of 1824 and 1828, or to make revenue the primary object and protection the incident, as was the case in the Walker tariff of 1846 and the tariff of 1857. The ablest expounders of the Constitution, and among them I name Story and Webster, uphold this view. Tariff for revenue, with incidental protection, was the doctrine of our forefathers, and of all great Democratic leaders of former times.

Hamilton is counted as high authority among the high protectionists. But who will say that his scheme of taxation would ever have seen the light of day had it not been for the strong financial needs of an infant government for revenue to pay its expenses and to meet its revolutionary obligations? Revenue was his object and aim; in his admirable report, it is true, he showed how this burden of taxation could be made to aid our infant manufactures; his plan was so wise and so successful that it won for him the matchless eulogium pronounced on him by Daniel Webster when he said:

He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenues gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of public credit, and it sprung upon its feet. The fabled birth of Minerva from the brain of Jove was hardly more sudden or more perfect than the financial system of the United States as t burst from the conception of Alexander Hamilton.

Washington, who signed the first tariff bill "to protect manufactures," said:

The safety and interests of the people require that they should promote such manufactures as tend to render them independent of others for essential, particularly for military, supplies.

Jefferson, in his message in 1802, said that the proper protection to American industries was one of the "landmarks by which to guide ourselves in all our proceedings." In 1808, in his message to Congress, he congratulated the country that the new manufacturing interests would, under "protecting duties," become permanent.

Monroe, in his inaugural in 1817, said:

Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of our Government.

Jackson, in 1824, in his letter to Dr. Coleman, said:

The American farmer has neither a foreign nor a home market except for cotton. Does not this clearly prove that there is too much labor employed in agriculture and that the channels of labor should be multiplied? Common sense points out at once the remedy. Draw from agriculture the superabundant labor and employ it in mechanism and manufactures, thereby creating a home market for your breadstuffs and distributing labor to a most profitable account, and benefits to the country will result. Take from agriculture in the United States 600,000 men, women, and children, and you at once give a home market for more breadstuffs than all Engl and now furnishes.

And he also said "that our manufacturing interests ought to have extended to them adequate protection, that our manufacturers and laborers may be placed in fair competition with those of Europe."

In his message December 7, 1830, he upheld the constitutional power of Congress to maintain and adjust duties on imports "with a view to the encouragement of domestic branches of industry." To these can be added the names of Dickinson, Dallas, Wright, Buchanan, and other distinguished Democrats of the past.

I feel that no Democrat can be read out of his party who holds views on the tariff question similar to those held by such a host of departed patriots and statesmen.

In view of the well-known diversity of sentiment on the tariff question, it was my opinion in the beginning that the reduction of taxation could not be made on customs duties. Therefore I favored the repeal of all internal taxes, and so declared myself when the bonded whisky bill was under discussion in this House. And I still think the wisest and most popular act this Congress can perform in the way of lifting the burden of taxation from the people is to repeal all internal taxes. I thought we could all agree to wipe out a system of taxation that is unpopular, undemocratic, and expensive, and which remains to-day the most disagreeable reminder of war times and "war taxes."

But it seems now that a large majority of this House, on both sides, are opposed to the repeal during this Congress of taxes on spirits distilled from grain. This action takes out of the control of the House about $75,000,000 of revenue. The Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, has estimated the revenues from internal taxation at $120,000,000. According to this estimate only $45,000,000 would remain subject to repeal. But by a modification of the sinking-fund law in such a way that the interest annually accruing and 1 per cent. per annum of the debt only shall be paid, according to the original sinking-fund law, and a reduction of our expenses to the necessities of the Government, economically administered, a much larger amount of revenues could be released and a larger burden would be removed.

Is it wise policy to continue the payment of the public debt as rapidly as we have been for the last few years? At the rate of present reduction the generation that fought the war will pay the debt. Last year we paid on the interest $59,160,131.25, and to the sinking fund and principal of the public debt $134,178,756.96. I claim that $90,000,000 was unwisely paid, and instead of reducing taxation and revenues $45,000,000 the reduction should be just twice that. I do not claim that a public debt is a public blessing; but this generation has paid about one-half of the war debt. The credit of the Government is such that her whole indebtedness could be carried at 3 per cent. interest.

The bonds are in great demand for investment by banking, insurance, and savings institutions; they are absolutely necessary if our national banking system is to be continued. Then why continue the law which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to apply the surplus revenue to the payment of our outstanding bonds? Indeed, we ought to get rid of that surplus, not by wild schemes of legislation and lavish expenditures, as it is proposed by the public-buildings bill, or by some river-and-harbor appropriation, but by reducing revenues. Let us remove from the gaze of the member from Colorado this tempting surplus.

But in spite of the strong and urgent reasons presented for the repeal of internal taxes not raised from spirits distilled from grain a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means have introduced "a bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes." Strange title for a bill which makes a war tariff its basis! The bill speaks of war-tariff taxes, yet omits all internal taxes, which are pre-eminently war taxes. We have never resorted to internal taxes except in times of war or to meet war expenses. Why this omission? A settled determination to eliminate every protective feature from our statutes is the only honest reply to the question. To accomplish this purpose, a number of gentlemen speaking for the bill before us, have expressed themselves in favor of restoring the odious and inquisitorial income tax.

Why this tender regard for those engaged in distilling spirits and this supreme indifference and studied disregard of those engaged in manufacturing enterprises?

The friends of this system after their defeat in this House on the bonded whiskey bill succeeded in passing in this body by a large vote a resolution declaring that this Congress would not interfere with the whisky interests by repealing the tax on it. It would have been more just and more satisfactory to the country and to the manufacturing, commercial, and laboring classes of the nation had we passed a similar resolution giving repose and assurance to a class of people as deserving as those who distill spirits from grain.

The people are everywhere asking, "What good do you propose to accomplish by this agitation of the tariff question?" Our last act of general revision of the tariff kept the business of the country in excitement and suspense for two years; it went into effect only in July last. We have reports of its operations for only eight months. Are we unwilling to wait long enough to see what one year's imports will yield? Are we to treat tariff legislation like the boy did his hill of beans, who dug them up every morning to see if they had sprouted?

By your tariff agitation you have kept the manufacturing interests of the country on tenter-hooks for more than two years, and by your present bill you propose to keep them there for two years more. How long do you suppose they can stand the strain?

Its agitation in the last Congress drove the Republican party out of power in this branch of the Legislature, not because it was alone in the agitation, but because it was the responsible party in power. If we on this side of the House are wise, we will ponder well this lesson of experience. Because this agitation is useless I am opposed to it. A bad tariff with few changes is better than a good one which is constantly changing. In the former case the capitalist and laborer can discount the future; in the latter case it is impossible to do so.

I am satisfied that had our tariff laws been less subject to changes, many branches of industry now needing the fostering care of the Government might be self-sustaining. But what is our history on the subject of tariff legislation? It has been as variable and changeable as the rise and fall of the mercury in the thermometer. Since 1789 there have been passed sixty acts, more or less general, affecting customs duties. Five of them, namely, 1790, 1816, 1846, 1861, and 1883, were general repealing statutes. Some, like the acts of 1824, 1828, 1833, 1842, and 1857, made radical and sweeping changes. Besides we have done a great deal of tariff legislation in treaties, the most pernicious method of all tariff legislation. From 1790 to 1861, a period of seventy-one years, twenty-two years would cover the whole protective period—the period from 1824 to 1846. Yet during this period no less than five changes were made in the rates of duty. Prior to 1861 it never had five consecutive years of repose.

Is it any wonder that this "infant," which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WARNER] has abused in his very able speech, has not grown up to strong and vigorous manhood? It has suffered not only from the neglect and hatred of its enemies, but from the over-indulgence of its friends. How did Great Britain achieve her supremacy in the commercial and manufacturing world? It was by a system of protection, commencing in the reign of Edward III, and persistently adhered to until 1846, a period of more than five centuries. Not till then was she prepared to dispense with all protection.

That the present tariff legislation abounds in inequalities, wrongs, and imperfections, I am free to admit; that there are some things too highly and others not sufficiently protected, can not be denied; that a general revision, at a proper time, on a business basis is a desideratum which few will gainsay. The bill under consideration does not meet a single one of these objections. It is an indiscriminate reduction, based upon no sound principle. It will not even accomplish the one single object its framer had in view—that is, the reduction of revenues.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, whose knowledge of tariff laws both as a large and practical manufacturer and as a profound student of economic science, has expressed his fears that it will not reduce revenues. This candid statement has had much to do in convincing me that this bill ought not to pass. I do not want to go home to my constituents and say that I supported a bill which was at best a mere pretense and a sham.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means seems to have overlooked a very simple fact—one that lies at the basis of his own political philosophy as a revenue reformer—that a reduction of customs rates does not result in a reduction of revenues, but on the contrary, and within certain limits, results in an increase of revenues. A tariff for revenue only presents a very simple task. The free-list must be enlarged, and the duties collected from a few leading articles of general consumption. A model is furnished to our friends in the British tariff.

This bill, then, is merely a measure of agitation for the sake of agitation—agitation because the majority which controls this side of the House desire agitation; agitation that must be fruitless in view of the fact that the other branch of the legislature will not concur with us and the Executive will not approve it. I could even rest content with mere negative results were it not for the serious effect this agitation will have on the political prospects of that organization which we all on this side of the House desire to see succeed in the coming political contest that is near at hand.

Some of the friends of this bill have felt it necessary to explain the defeat of General Hancock in 1880. The explanation is that we did not stand by the revenue plank in the platform of 1880. I am satisfied that if we had placed upon that clause in the Cincinnati platform of 1880 the same interpretation that the Democratic members from Texas and Illinois now place upon it we would not have carried a Northern State. Six weeks before the election General Hancock was far ahead in the race. His splendid and unimpeachable record was rapidly placing him ahead of his opponent, whose record had been besmirched by his own party friends.

The Republican party was at its wits' ends. A happy thought struck it. They agreed to abandon the hopeless task of defending a damaged reputation and a contradictory record, and put the Democrats on the defensive on its tariff plank in the platform, which found its way there in a moment of thoughtlessness produced by the enthusiasm consequent upon General Hancock's nomination. From the moment that policy was adopted we were doomed. Explanation of the clause was unavailing; the tide set against us and continued so till the end of the campaign.

Will we, then, with this sad experience before us, repeat this folly just on the eve of your nominating convention? Such madness and folly seem incomprehensible.

I have no doubt that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] was truly sincere when he said the other day that he thanked this side of the House for the position it had taken on the tariff question; that we could now no longer say our policy was not free trade.

The present bill is not "a tariff for revenue only." It has no semblance to such a measure. It is only an acceptance of all the alleged vices inherent in a high protective tariff. It has adopted compound duties—duties specific and duties ad valorem. It has adopted one maximum limit for iron, another for wool, and another for cotton manufactures, and then a general minimum limit for all (the Morrill tariff of 1861), with a list of exceptions as large as the items included in the general bill.

If this bill should become a law our tariff system would become one of the most complicated specimens of legislation which the ingenuity of man ever contrived. Take one of the simplest items for calculation affected by this bill—pig-iron. This bill provides in the first place for a 20 per cent. reduction of present duties. We then refer to the present law and find it to be on pig-iron three-tenths of 1 per cent. a pound, three-tenths of 1 cent in 2,240 pounds gives the duty of $6.72. Reduce this 20 per cent., which is $1.344, and it leaves $5.376. But this brings us below the grade line of the "Morrill tariff," which is $6 per ton. So we must throw away the $0.624 excess and reduce only $0.72. Here it is made necessary to refer to three distinct acts to find a single duty on a simple item. Is this the feast that revenue reform invites us to partake of?

All laws relating to our revenues ought to be as simple as it is possible for human skill and science to make them. As little as possible should be left, in their administration, for experts and revenue officers to guess at, whereby importers are robbed and the Treasury plundered. Departmental construction in many cases has defeated the intention of Congress, and has opened a wide door to frauds, litigation, and confusion.

Want of time is another excuse given for this bill. Well, Mr. Chairman, if a proper bill introduced in the beginning of the first session of Congress, with fifteen months before it, can not be considered and matured, what are we to do? Change the Constitution and increase the term of office of Representatives to four or six years so as to prevent the bill from dying every two years? Or must we at last leave the question to scientific and practical experts—in other words, to a "commission," which has been so well abused here?

I frankly admit that the task of framing a general tariff measure based on correct principles is almost herculean. It will tax the powers of the most athletic mind and comprehensive statesmanship. That we can frame one that will do complete justice and give entire satisfaction to all our varied and complicated industries no one seriously believes. The best bill that we can pass will be in the end a compromise of conflicting interests and a partial reconciliation of antagonisms. But even this consideration is no justification for the course pursued by the framers of this bill. It is a complete admission of incompetence or indifference.

Incidental protection was a feature in all our early tariff legislation. In that policy this generation of men is not responsible; that rests with our forefathers, as I have shown. Wise or unwise originally, it has entwined itself into all our legislation for nearly a century, and we can not now uproot it unless we overturn the foundations on which our social and industrial fabric rests. One of the speakers in this debate has called it a "loathsome cancer" in the body-politic; if such it is, your proposed surgery will end the life of the unfortunate subject. Its ligaments have spread till they penetrated every vital organ of the patient.

It came into our legislation by the votes and influence of statesmen from a section of the country which of late years has opposed it, and against the votes and protests of men from a section that now supports it. It is one of the strangest occurrences in our political history. Calhoun, who afterward became the champion of free trade, voted for the tariff measures of 1816. Webster, speaking and voting for New England, voted against the bill of 1816 and 1824. He represented in Congress then a section of the Union whose attention was largely absorbed in commerce.

But under the stimulus of protective duties these people turned their attention to manufactures. Their commerce was in a measure abandoned for the more profitable enterprise of manufacturing all kinds of goods and wares. Millions of money and capital soon became invested in New England, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania in manufacturing establishments. Their policy changed to meet changed conditions of life. History furnishes no parallel to their rapid growth and development. Your census reports show what the progress has been. We contemplate it with pride and patriotism. Free trade may have done as well for us, but this we do not know; we do know what incidental protection has done for us. Shall we then in our avarice or ignorance kill the goose that lays the golden egg?

It is true that after this system had been in operation nearly forty years, its early friends from the South began to oppose it for the reason that its system of servile labor made it more profitable for the people of that section to remain agriculturists and producers of cotton, sugar, rice, and tobacco. But in law and in morals the South was estopped. She induced us of the North to invest our capital in manufactures under the temptation of protective duties; we did so, and the destruction of that system now would involve us, with them, in ruin. I can hardly believe that the South will give its support to this bill.

I look upon that section of the country with great interest. The ball and chain on her progress have been removed by the war. To-day she presents a spectacle truly grand and sublime. Out of the ruin and devastation wrought by a gigantic civil war, with all her institutions, laws, and governments involved in the general disaster, her property destroyed, her land desolate, her civilization turned upside down, her hopes, aims, and ambitions blasted and disappointed, she emerges a a mighty and puissant nation, adapting herself with an alacrity not witnessed in the history of nations to her changed circumstances and conditions.

What a future opens up for the South! Possessed of a fruitful soil, a genial climate, with a variety and richness of productions not surpassed by any people on the face of the earth, the South has in herself all the elements of a great empire. Magnificent streams with water-power facilities to spin the cotton of the whole world, a coast-line furnishing harbors for the commerce of a mighty nation, only await the advent of capital and enterprise to place the South in the front as a manufacturing people.

I saw a statement only a few days ago that $28,000,000 had in the space of sixty days gone to the South from the North for investment in railroad and manufacturing enterprises. She lost in the great contest of sections because Heaven so willed it; yet there is a field of contest where a victory may be won by her more glorious than that obtained by her late triumphant foes, a victory whose laurels will not be stained with blood, and which will not leave behind it widows and orphans, bitterness and hate. There are peaceful achievements for this brave, chivalric people which will be "no less renowned than war." It is to be accomplished in the workshop, the factory, the farm, and in the ship-yard. All she needs is encouragement of the same kind that New England and the North have had.

If it be true that the cotton and woolen manufactories of New England and the furnaces and rolling-mills of Pennsylvania were built up by tribute—as has been said here in debate—extorted from you, will you now, when New England and Pennsylvania are willing to pay tribute back to you, say, "No, we don't want it?" Will Alabama, the great cotton-growing State of the Union, when the prospect of transferring the cotton manufactures of Lowell to the banks of the Mobile, say, "We want none of your aid?" I could imagine in such a case a reason why New England might refuse such aid; I can not imagine why the South should refuse it.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been considered a protectionist for the sake of protection. I had the honor to serve in this body in the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses. The tariff question was under consideration several times during those four years. I invariably voted for the reduction of customs taxes. I voted to put salt on the free-list; also to place tea and coffee there. I voted for the 10 per cent. reduction in the act of June 6, 1872, and said at that time that I was willing to vote for a larger reduction. But since then a great many reductions have been made, and only last year a large reduction in tariff rates was again brought about. I represent large iron and manufacturing interests in my district, and I am assured by men perfectly disinterested that another reduction at this time of 20 per cent. would close up some establishments and utterly ruin others.

The industrial interests to be affected by this legislation are immense. By the last census it is shown that there were in the year 1880 253,840 establishments in the United States with an invested capital of $2,790,233,506, and employing 2,738,950 hands, who receive $947,919,674 for wages; these establishments annually operate on materials valued at $3,394,340,026, and turning out an annual product of $5,369,667,706. These figures possess an eloquence beyond the power of human utterance. They are facts.

Much has been said about the farmer in connection with the tariff. It can not be denied that to a great extent his foreign market has been cut off, and he can no longer depend upon it. England, formerly his best customer, is supplying herself from a cheaper market, from Russia, from the Baltic, and from Australia. If that be true, are we going to increase his embarrassment by diverting from manufacturing channels $2,790,233,506 of capital and nearly 3,000,000 laborers, and force them into agricultural pursuits? There is where this capital and labor in the main must drift. The cheap, fertile lands of the West and South will tempt them in that direction. Instead of being consumers of the farmers' products, they will become producers of their own.

It is also said that the tariff robs the laboring man as well as the farmer. Yet it is a remarkable fact that while the laboring man may not always get his fair share of the profits produced by capital and labor, he has presented no request or petition during this whole agitation, covering several years, for a reduction of tariff duties. The laboring interest of this country is well organized. It is watching every bill introduced into this House which directly or indirectly concerns them, and we are hearing from them every day on bills before us. But no branch of the labor organization, by committee, attorney, petition, or otherwise, has appeared before you asking you to pass this bill. On the contrary, they are opposed to it. In view of the feeling which labor is now supposed to entertain against capital, is it to be supposed that if the tariff is only a contrivance by which the capitalist is to enrich himself at the expense of the laborer the latter would even keep silent?

It is one of the remarkable facts in this whole investigation that no one representing the farmer or laborer as a class has appeared in their behalf to favor this bill. All this talk about the tariff being hostile to the farmer and laboring man is pure gush. The large profits realized by capitalists on their investments is another assertion that has no foundation in fact. Many have acquired fortunes, as has been the case in mercantile and other pursuits, but when compared to the number who have failed and lost all their investments they are few.

There have been occasions when parties have purchased iron plants, for instance, at a sheriff's or assignee's sale at one-third or one-fourth the actual value, and a "boom" in the iron business taking place, as it did a few years ago, fortunes have been made in a few years. But these are phenomenal cases and furnish no standard by which to judge the business. Overproduction has been discussed as another reason why our tariff legislation should be repealed. But overproduction cheapens prices, and the consumer, for whom the friends of this bill are so solicitous, gets the benefit.

I admit that it is desirable that the current of trade and business ought to flow evenly; it is better that there should be no overproduction or scarcity in manufactured articles, and when the individual shall appear with a remedy for overproduction or underproduction, for panics, booms, and hard times, he will be regarded as the greatest benefactor of his age. The unsolved problem of political science to-day is to find some method by which the balance of trade may be regulated, by which supply and demand may be so maintained that an equilibrium may be established between them. It can not be solved by destroying the supply, as is proposed by some who would strike down our manufacturing interests. The plan is like the Yankee's remedy to prevent a horse from throwing off his bridle, which was to take the bridle off and use a halter.

Mr. Chairman, if the bill before us is amended so as to conform to the views indicated in these remarks, and a repeal of all internal taxes except those on spirits distilled from grain be included, I will vote for the bill; if not, I shall oppose it; and in doing so I can not be considered as opposed to a just revision and reduction of customs duties, nor as indorsing the errors, wrongs, and inequalities of our existing tariff laws.

I now yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. LAWRENCE].

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am very much obliged to my friend and colleague who has taken his seat [Mr. STORM] for his courtesy in yielding me a portion of his time; and not only that, but for his very able and exhaustive argument upon this subject. I am only sorry that every member of this House was not present to hear him, it was such an able argument on this question, and in such great contrast to the one we heard from the gentleman just before him.

Mr. Chairman, although the provisions of the Morrison tariff bill have been fully and freely discussed here and in the public journals of the country, and nothing especially new can be said, yet I offer no apology for the time I may consume in expressing my opinion, for my constituents are very deeply interested in the questions involved, and on the final issue of the measure. Among them are large manufacturers, employing many laborers; then agriculturists, producers, wool-growers, stock-men, with their associations organized for the common good. Miners, excavating millions of tons of coal; men in charge of schools, academies, colleges, merchants, mechanics; and intelligent discussions have been had in primary meetings by thoughtful, intelligent men on all phases of the questions involved in this act. And when I enter my solemn and emphatic protest against this measure, fraught with such peril to the substantial interests and prosperity of the country, I speak the sentiments of at least four-fifths of my constituents without regard to party proclivities.

For the last fifty years periodical attacks have been made on the American system—so named in the days of Clay, Webster, and Stewart. In 1816–1829, and on until 1841 and 1846, these attacks generally came from leading men of the South—Calhoun, McDuffie, Hayne, Hammond, and others; but for twenty years or more just passed the teachings of Southern men who owned their laborers and were mostly engaged in raising cotton have found advocates in the Western States of the Union. The cause of this has doubtless been the fact that among them there were few manufacturing establishments, most of the population was engaged in agricultural pursuits, and, raising cattle for the Eastern markets, were essentially producers, and quite naturally embraced the idea so common that duties levied on the products of goods manufactured abroad enhanced the price to them here. This narrow view of the question has often led to this repeated and almost perpetual cry against manufacturers as a class of monopolists enriching themselves at the expense of others. Thoughtful men who examined the subject saw that one of the essential conditions to the growth and prosperity of any country was a proper division of labor, a diversity of employments; and Providence had wisely provided for this by giving some localities rough lands not suited to agricultural purposes, but with water-power and great advantages for manufacturing purposes, and under these lands was found stone, coal, iron ore, and the raw material in great abundance; then in other places rich farming and grazing lands for the production of the cereals, meat, &c., for food.

The wise policy of our fathers was to encourage diversified industries, build up manufactories in iron, wool, cotton, &c., where laborers could be employed, where there would be an army of consumers to take and use in a home market the products of the farmer. To do this it was absolutely necessary to place a tariff on foreign goods at that time, not so much for revenue to support the Government as for protection to our infant manufactories. Of course all sensible men knew in 1816, about twenty-seven years after the adoption of the national Constitution, with limited means, with little skilled labor and little machinery, we could not compete with England, and our wisest statesmen saw that by a just system of imposts on all goods manufactured abroad that could be manufactured here would tend to build up and strengthen our own industries and create rivalry and competition in the United States, and hence the adoption of this policy as an essential system. It was bitterly assailed, and the same cry was then made that is now, that the poor man would be oppressed and must pay the duties, and that direct taxation to sustain the Government was preferable. The sequel proved that this healthy competition at home brought about by the tariff policy reduced some articles in a few years below the duties imposed. It was laid down by Hon. Andrew Stewart (one of the ablest defenders of the protective system) "that there never was a high protective tariff imposed on any article where the price was not in the end reduced."

Glass manufactured abroad at one time cost $12 per box. A duty of $4 was placed on it, and the competition in our own market reduced it to $2 per box, just one-half the duty. Four cents per pound was put on cut nails when the price was 12 cents per pound, and the competition brought them down to 3 and 4 cents per pound, even less than the duty.

Many of the most able and trusted leaders of the old Democratic party were bold and fearless advocates of this system, and none more so than Jefferson and Jackson. Their teachings are repudiated by the free-trade wing of the Democratic party to-day, and Senator BECK, of Kentucky, boldly warns Mr. RANDALL and his branch of the party what they may expect. In his speech recently delivered in the Senate he used this language:

> Men who think they are Democrats and take the position that the Senators from Vermont and Ohio do will find but little comfort inside the Democratic camp after the national convention meets.

Last year a revision of the tariff was made by the aid of an intelligent commission, authorized by Congress, to meet the demands made by many good men that in the present advanced stage of manufactures in this country some reduction of duties on specific articles might be properly made. The intention was to get some permanent basis where the country would rest and be free from agitation. The just protection afforded by the act of 1867 to some interests, especially wool grown in this country, was unwisely and unjustly reduced, and it was hoped this duty could be restored when an examination showed it necessary to the safety and encouragement of the American wool-grower coming in competition with the wool grown on cheap lands and by cheap labor abroad. Yet, instead of allowing this to be done and permitting the work of the commission and the act of Congress to stand as a fair concession to this spirit of free trade, this Morrison bill is pressed upon the country before a trial could be made of the act of 1883, and alarm, distrust, and almost a panic is produced in the manufacturing and commercial business of the country, which may lead to disastrous results, and this not by any action or demand from the people, but to create an issue on a question of vital interest which may assist this particular and dominant wing of the Democratic party to succeed at the coming election.

This horizontal 20 per cent. experiment was made in 1857, when there was no necessity for it, and made the revision of 1861 necessary; and the act making a 10 per cent. reduction in 1872 was repealed in 1875. It is an indiscriminate method of striking at all interests, and so incongruous (as shown by the able analysis of the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. MCKINLEY, himself a member of the Committee of Ways and Means) that no officer of the custom-house or importer can understand it. And very properly did Mr. BECK, the able Senator from Kentucky, say:

I admit that we have not been able to present a very satisfactory bill for relief from tariff taxation in the House of Representatives.

How significant this admission by one of the ablest of this free-trade branch of this party.

In 1872 the Democratic platform had in it this declaration:

That there are in our midst honest but irreconcilable differences of opinion with regard to the respective systems of protection and free trade; we remit the discussion of the subject to the people in their Congressional districts and the decision of Congress thereon wholly free from Executive interference or dictation.

Now, as they come nearer and nearer to the open declaration of free trade (a position already assumed by some of their boldest leaders who declare for open ports all over the world) they propose, as a party, to tolerate no local differences; but they defiantly and imperiously demand that all Democrats who are not with them and for this bill are against them, and their proper place is in the Republican party.

This measure which you determine to make the shibboleth of your faith, and to which all who can remain in the party must subscribe, and on which you boldly stake the perpetuity of your party, will never meet the approval of the people. Can you ask any intelligent or thoughtful man to condemn a policy which has borne such fruit? When you go to the farmer, the mechanic, the laborer, and tell him this protective system is pernicious, that they are taxed to support the rich manufacturer, he turns with a significant smile and points you to the unexampled growth and prosperity of his country. He tells you that any system is a good one which will feed and clothe and make happy and contented 55,000,000 people; which has been so strong as to invite and induce 17,000,000 foreigners to share with us these blessings, and under which this country has grown from a small family of thirteen colonies into an empire with thirty-eight States and nine outlying Territories.

In the year 1860 the total wealth of the United States was estimated at about $16,150,000,000; this represented the accumulations of the nation from the earliest history of the country to the year the war broke out—a period of about three hundred and fifty years, more or less. David A. Wells, esq., one of the ablest champions of free trade, estimated the wealth of the country in 1882 at $64,636,000,000, which shows an increase in wealth of 400 per cent. in twenty years. The wealth of Great Britain was estimated by Mr. Mulhall, of the Royal Society of London, in 1882 at $40,640,000,000. If these estimates are approximately correct, the increase in our wealth as a nation in twenty years has been $3,846,000,000. We have been under a fair protective tariff all these twenty years. Mr. Charles S. Hill, statistician of the State Department of the United States, estimated our national wealth in 1880 at $55,000,000,000. This would appear fabulous if the calculation was not based on actual facts and figures. We have reduced the national debt from $2,600,000,000 to $1,600,000,000 in these twenty years under fair protection. While we have generally kept the balance of trade in our favor, we have by care and general prosperity increased our population 20,000,000. The population of our large cities has doubled. The product of our coal mines has increased from 14,000,000 tons in 1860 to 80,000,000 tons in 1880.

The number of farms in the United States in 1860 was estimated at 2,000,000, and in 1880, 4,000,000, and the value of these has increased from $3,000,000,000 to over $10,000,000,000. The product of cereals increased under protection from 1,230,000,000 bushels in 1860 to 2,700,000,000 in 1880, over 100 per cent. The value of live-stock has risen from $1,000,000,000 in 1860 to $2,500,000,000 in 1880, and the annual products of the farm have risen to $3,000,000,000.

The tariff of 1867 on wool stimulated that industry and the number of sheep from 22,000,000 in 1860 to 40,000,000 in 1884, and the home products of wool have increased from 60,000,000 to 240,000,000 pounds. These facts and figures are taken from carefully prepared statements of Mr. R. B. Porter, of the late Tariff Commission, and Mr. E. P. Martin, of New York, who has given the subject patient and careful investigation, and they show to all reasonable men that this wise system of protecting labor of our own country, manufacturing our own goods in all departments of production on our own soil, consuming the produce of the agriculturists in the home market, has enabled us to pay fair wages for labor and has added in the general aggregate to our national wealth in an unparalleled ratio. Instead of spending our money abroad we have kept it at home, the balance of trade has been generally in our favor, and it is estimated that 90 per cent. of production goes to pay for labor, and this is spent among our own people.

This statement of results is so overwhelming that I can not see how our opponents are to meet it. It is a full, complete, unanswerable argument to all the theories of the advocates of this measure. In the light of such facts, how do you expect to convince the laboring men of the country that they are oppressed and pay to make the manufacturers rich while they grow poorer and still poorer? You greatly underrate the intelligence of this class of our citizens when you thus appeal to their passions and prejudices. Among the class of toilers in our mills, mines, and workshops you find many who have had practical lessons on this subject and read and understand the political economy and wisdom which underlies this whole economic and self-sustaining system better than you do, and are entirely satisfied with the results. They understand the plain and simple proposition that goods of all descriptions, whether composed of wool, cotton, silk, steel, or iron, must be manufactured for the common wants and demands of the country, and when you propose this shall be done on the other side of the Atlantic by the cheap labor of European countries and the product carried here free of duty they answer you with the common-sense argument which you have failed to comprehend: "We have the raw material growing in fleeces on our own sheep, the cotton raised on our own soil, the iron ore in our own hills, the coal in inexhaustible quantities for fuel, and oil to lubricate the machinery of the world; we have the machinery, the skill, the industry to run our own mills, to produce most that we need for the common uses of men. We have willing and intelligent laborers, and we will give them the preference, because they are identified with us as citizens, having a common interest with us in all that pertains to the wealth, happiness, and prosperity of our common country."

Our manufacturers can not compete with foreigners in the same business (unless protected by proper impost duties which go into the common Treasury) by reducing the price of labor to the standard abroad. Do you demand this on the mistaken plea that you will buy goods cheaper? Do you not see that Cobden free-trade clubs are being formed in many localities in the United States, boldly demanding the overthrow of this beneficent system under your teachings? Suppose you could succeed in electing your candidate to the Presidency and obtaining control of both Houses of Congress, and reduce the duties to your standard (which some of you frankly admit is only opening the door to your ultimate purpose of the entire and absolute abrogation of all impost duties), what would be your condition? Of course your manufacturing establishments must go down, because American laborers will not, can not live at such prices as could be offered them. You drive the American from his own market and foster the mills and workmen abroad, and having succeeded by your policy in accomplishing this, the foreign manufacturer takes control of your market without competition and at once raises the price of his goods to suit himself. You will then have driven your own manufacturers out of the market which of right belonged to them and given to those who owe you no allegiance, thrown millions of men out of employment, destroyed or impaired the value of hundreds of millions' worth of property in mills and machinery, and sent into agricultural and other pursuits those whose business you have destroyed or rendered unproductive, breaking up our whole economic system and this proper division of labor, and giving us a nation of producers with no home market for our surplus products. Contemplate thoughtfully the inevitable result of your policy, your great national industries blotted out and a prey to the cupidity of Great Britain, your country flooded with goods manufactured abroad, the products of British capital and degraded labor, and no means to purchase them; millions of honest men idle, with parents and children in want, because you have taken away their birthright in this free land and given it to the subjects of a foreign power.

The concession made to the clamor for a reduction of the duties in the tariff of 1867 by appointing a commission to examine and revise it with a view to permanent reduction was in my judgment a mistake. The country was prospering, laborers were receiving adequate compensation for work, and were for the most part entirely contented. We were exporting more than we were importing; the future seemed to be full of promise.

The modifications and reductions recommended by the commission were so changed in the House and Senate that really it might have been claimed little of the work of the commission was left, and so conflicting were the provisions that it required an expert to harmonize them before being authoritatively published.

The depression in the general business of the country for the last year has been caused for the most part by these changes, and now absolute distrust and a well-grounded fear of the passage of the Morrison bill has well-nigh produced a panic among the manufacturers of all kinds of domestic goods. They hesitate to make contracts ahead. They fear the ascendency of this free-trade party, and must exercise caution. They will make no outlays for new buildings, will add nothing to their capital, will run cautiously with a limited number of hands. Like the engineer in charge of a train where bridges and trestles are weak, he moves with caution, afraid to put on steam and make the run in the usual time. Give him positive assurance that the road is in excellent condition—bridges strong, tunnels well arched, road-bed solid—and he goes fearlessly and rapidly to his destination.

Let business men be assured that the Republican party shall be kept in power, that the proper protection shall be given us under their tariff of 1867, and steam will be applied, confidence restored, and the train will run on full time with ample provision on hand.

Mr. Chairman, before I close I desire to say a word in behalf of an interest which has suffered very much by the tariff of 1883, and in which my constituents are very deeply interested, and which will be literally destroyed (at least so far as Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia are concerned) if the bill now before us should pass. The wool-growing and sheep-breeding interest is second to none in importance in the United States, and is essential to the happiness and comfort of the whole people.

At least $150,000 was lost in last year's crop alone to the counties I represent by the reduction in the tariff of 1883, and yet some members of Congress from agricultural and wool-growing districts voted for it. Few of these will ever do so again. While many have seen and examined a statistical and interesting presentation on this subject made before the Committee of Ways and Means by Hon. Columbus Delano, of Ohio, president of the National Wool-Growers' Association, very many have not, and as it presents the subject in detail and at very much greater length than I have time to devote to any similar preparation, and the statements made are entirely in accord with my sentiments, I append them that I may give them circulation over my district.

These tables for the most part are taken from official papers in the Agricultural and Treasury Departments here and are entirely reliable. Indeed, on a subject affecting so vitally the whole country, we can not afford to be incorrect. Examine them in detail and you will find them interesting and instructive on this question. This whole question will be committed to the electors of the country in November next, and an emphatic declaration against it, and those who would make it the established policy of the country, would possibly prevent its introduction into the Forty-ninth Congress. It can not now pass a Republican Senate or meet the approval of the Executive. This is the last speech I shall make on it here, as in all probability I shall not return; but my successor will be in accord with the sentiments I have expressed, and at least one district will remain true to the policy of our fathers on this vital question.

APPENDIX.

THE TARIFF—WOOL.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1884.

Statement of Mr. Columbus Delano.

Mr. Columbus Delano, of Ohio, addressed the committee on the subject of the duties on wool. He said:

Mr. Chairman and gentleman of the committee, the duty which I have undertaken to perform before this committee in behalf of the wool-growers of the United States is simply to urge the reasons for a restoration of the wool duties in the tariff of 1867. It is not my purpose to discuss the bill which is now pending before you, and which goes by the name of your chairman, or the general principles of economic legislation, except as they may be incidentally involved in the propositions which I have to make. It is a duty which I have undertaken with reluctance, and so far as I am concerned, I am indebted to the voluntary hospitality (so to speak) of the committee for the privilege of appearing here, as I made no request to be heard.

I wish to invite your attention, therefore, to the skeleton of my argument.

I shall endeavor to show, in the first place, that wool-growing had no prosperity in the United States worthy of that name until the act of 1867 was passed. Under that head I shall attempt to show you what magnitude and importance it has assumed under the influence of that legislation, and under the promise, implied, if not expressed, that the legislation was to be permanently secured to the wool-growers and to their industry.

Then I shall attempt to show you the influence of the tariff of 1883 on this prosperity, both from facts outside of the record and from an examination of facts which are exhibited in the administration of your customs in the first six months of the influence of this law of 1883.

These, with an answer to some of the arguments that have been made against a restoration of the tariff of 1867 and in favor of that of 1883, constitute a skeleton of my remarks.

PROTECTIVE DUTY ON WOOL.

During the first thirty-five years of the Republic the National Legislature offered no encouragement to the production of wool, but it was admitted free of duty. The tariff act of May 22, 1824, first recognized the importance of wool-growing and contained the following clause:

"On wool a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem until the 1st day of June, 1825; afterward a duty of 30 per cent.: Provided, That all wool the actual value of which at the place whence imported shall not exceed 10 cents per pound shall be charged with a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem."

The act of May 19, 1828, advanced the duty on wool costing 10 cents per pound and over to 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem until the 30th of June, 1829, from which time an additional ad valorem duty of 5 per cent. was imposed yearly until the whole ad valorem duty should amount to 50 per cent. When this tariff bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives Mr. Stevenson, of Pennsylvania, said: "Hemp, iron, spirits, wool, and woolens are equally entitled to protection." In the Senate Mr. Benton proposed to insert a clause laying a progressive duty of 10 per cent. per annum on wool until it should amount to 50 per cent. ad valorem and 5 per cent. afterward until it should amount to 79 per cent. The act of July 14, 1832, which took effect March 3, 1833, admitted free of duty wool costing 8 cents or less per pound, and imposed a duty of 4 cents per pound and 40 per cent. ad valorem on wool costing 8 cents and over per pound. The act of 1842 imposed 5 per cent. on wool costing not over 7 cents, and 3 cents per pound and 30 per cent. ad valorem on all others. In 1846 the specific duty was abolished, and in 1847 the ad valorem was reduced to 24 per cent. The tariff of 1857 admitted free all wool costing 20 cents or less per pound, and that of 1861 imposed a duty of 5 per cent. on wool costing less than 18 cents, 3 cents per pound for that costing 18 to 24 cents, and 9 cents on that costing over 24 cents per pound. The act of 1864 advanced the rates to 3 cents per pound for wool costing 12 cents or less, 6 cents for that costing from 12 to 24 cents, 10 cents per pound and 10 per cent. ad valorem on that costing from 24 to 32 cents, and 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. on all costing over 32 cents per pound.

This history of protective legislation on wool is given for the purpose of substantiating the observation that legislation previous to the tariff act of 1867 failed to afford such protection as would justify American agriculturists in investing largely in the business of wool-growing, and this fact made apparent the necessity for the act of 1867, which afforded to wool-growers the first adequate protection ever extended to them.

The act of March 2, 1867, provided that all wools should be divided into three classes for the purpose of fixing duties, namely: first, clothing; second, combing; and third, carpet wool.

Upon wools of the second class and of the first, unwashed, of the value of 32 cents or less per pound, a duty was imposed of 10 cents per pound, and 11 per cent. ad valorem; exceeding 32 cents in value, 12 cents per pound and 10 per cent. Upon wools of the third class, valued at 12 cents or less per pound, a duty of 3 cents per pound; exceeding 12 cents, 6 cents per pound. Washed of the first class were required to pay double duty, and scoured, of all classes, to pay three times the duty imposed on unwashed. These rates continued without change until July 1, 1883, except from August 1, 1872, to March 3, 1875, when there was a reduction of 10 per cent. therefrom.

The tariff of 1867, so far as it affected the respective interests of the wool-producers and the manufacturers of woolen goods, was the result of an agreement arrived at after long consideration and in a spirit of compromise. In its consummation the late Mr. Henry S. Randall and Dr. John L. Hayes exerted a strong influence. Its wise, just, and equitable provisions are easily demonstrated by statistics in regard to the production of wool before and since its passage.

It appears from reliable statistics that during the last four census years the number of sheep and the production of wool were as follows:

Census years.	Sheep.	Wool.
	Number.	Pounds.
1850	21,723,220	52,516,959
1860	22,471,225	60,264,913
1870	28,477,951	100,102,387
1880	43,576,899	235,648,834
1883	50,500,000	320,000,000

It will be seen from the above table that the increase in the number of sheep in the decade from 1850 to 1860 was only 748,055, equivalent to 3½ per cent.; but from 1860 to 1870 it amounted to 6,006,675, or 27 per cent. This augmentation was largely due to the protective tariff of 1867, the influence of which was felt during the subsequent decade, as the increase of more than 15,000,000 (15,098,948), or 53 per cent., in the number of sheep conclusively proves. From information that is believed to be trustworthy the number of sheep in the United States in the year 1883 was 50,500,000, an increase of 6,923,101 in three years, or 5.3 per cent. annually, the same average percentage of increase as occurred in the decade from 1870 to 1880.

The increase in the quantity of wool produced during the same period is still greater in proportion. This is accounted for in the following manner: Wool-growers having secured the assurance of the domestic market, by the act of 1867, at once took measures calculated to increase the production of wool. One of the methods necessary to accomplish this end was to increase the number of sheep; the next and most difficult was to make the animals produce a larger quantity of wool, and to this end the wool-growers of the West expended large sums of money for the purpose of procuring breeding animals that would cause their flocks to carry heavier fleeces. The result of this was that the increase in the average weight of fleece rose from 2½ and 3½ pounds to 5 and 5½ pounds, according to location. The cost of this experiment in breeding was much greater than one inexperienced in the business would suppose, but its successful result is demonstrated by the quantity of wool that the census tables now show was produced by the sheep of the United States and the average weight of their fleece.

Wool-growing was rarely remunerative as an industry in the United States until after the passage of the act of March, 1867. Since that time, until the reduction of duty under the act of 1883, American producers have been able to compete successfully with those of foreign countries, and our sheep farmers have been induced to multiply their flocks and increase the number of their sheep until there are, at the present time, more than one million persons (1,020,728) who are flock-masters, exclusive of those on public-land ranches. The statement hereafter given, prepared by the statistician of the Department of Agriculture, shows the number of flocks of sheep in each State and Territory of the Union, except those on public-land ranches. In view of the foregoing facts the United States Tariff Commission made the following observation, namely: "The phase of the industry of wool-production that arrests the attention of the economist is its general distribution. Not a State in the Union, and in some of these not a county, but has some portion of its wealth invested in wool production." Then referring to the act of 1867, the report continues: "The law fixing these duties was passed * * * with the approbation of the entire body of producers * * * the wisdom which guided its promotion has found substantial vindication in the growth of sheep husbandry during the past fifteen years. As a result of augmented production the price of wools has been reduced to the consumer." (See report, page 28.)

The report then proceeds to give the average prices of the United States wool clip in Boston for four periods, as follows: In 1867 (before the influence of the tariff had reduced the price), 51 cents per pound; in 1870, 46 cents; in 1875, 43 cents; in 1880, 48 cents.

The following conclusions are justified by what has been stated: that the number of sheep has been nearly, if not quite, doubled since the passage of the tariff act of 1867; that the quantity of wool annually produced is three times as great as it was at that date; and that the cost to the consumer had been reduced (prior to the passage of the act in 1883) about 6 cents per pound, or at the rate of 12 per cent. To produce these results wool-growers have expended many millions of dollars to obtain the best strains of blood for breeding purposes, in the construction and adaptation of farm buildings to meet the necessities of summer care and winter feeding, and in various other ways, all of which has been done under solemn compact with the manufacturers, sanctioned by an act of Congress, which guaranteed to the producers the home market for their wool. This is what the act of 1867 meant.

It follows logically and conclusively that any change in the tariff act of 1867 that fails to do what that law has done, namely, secure to the wool-growers of the United States the home market, will surely injure and tend to destroy an industry that gives employment to more than 1,000,000 flock-masters and several million employés, and adds each year to our national wealth more than 300,000,000 pounds of wool, valued at over $100,000,000, and 12,000,000 carcasses for food, valued at about $50,000,000.

EFFECTS OF THE ACT OF 1883.

The passage of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, has already crippled this important industry, and if the rates of duty imposed by the act of 1867 be not restored its destruction may be regarded as an accomplished fact.

If required to give reasons for these conclusions, I submit the following:

First. The price of wool before the passage of the act of 1883 was barely remunerative; the subsequent reduction of prices has been so great as to preclude profit, except perhaps in some of the Territories and sparsely-settled States, where the price of land is exceedingly low. I venture to state, without fear of successful contradiction, that the clip of 1883 has been sold by the producers at prices varying in different States from 2 to 5 cents per pound less than the clip of 1882. The producers in no States, so far as I am informed, sold at a reduction of less than 2 cents; in many of the States the reduction was greater, and in the States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia I venture to estimate it at an average of 4 cents or more per pound.

The actual loss on the clip of this year, estimated at 4 cents per pound, amounts to about $12,000,000. It is pertinent to ask, does the percentage of reduction to the consumer in the prices of woolen goods equal that in the price of wool?

It may be stated that the market quotations are made up or averaged from the prices at which wool has been sold or is held after it left the hands of the growers. The producers were compelled to sell their clip, for in many instances it furnishes the means of subsistence and of carrying on their business. They were met after the clip was ready for market with the reduction caused by the act of 1883, and they were in effect told that they must sell at a reduced price or find no purchasers.

That the importations have not been so large as some anticipated results from the fact that the wool-growers were compelled to part with their clip at a reduced price or permit the manufacturers to supply themselves more extensively with foreign wools. In short, to retain the domestic market they were compelled to reduce the price of their wools to a point that limited importations.

Second. The duties imposed by the act of 1867 were no more than were absolutely required to exclude such foreign wools as enter into competition with ours. Therefore the results of the act of 1883 are already observed in the large increase in the importation of wools from Australia and South America. The superior advantages for producing cheap wool that Australia possesses are not generally understood, and for that reason I desire to refer to the report of Mr. Owen Spencer, our consul-general at Melbourne, in which he states that the number of sheep in the British Australian colonies during 1880 and 1881 was 72,239,359, or nearly double the number contained in the United States. He says:

"The pastoral wealth of Australia is enormous; its capabilities for wool-growing are practicably unlimited; its mild climate and general adaptation to grazing purposes obviate the necessity of providing food and shelter during the winter; nature, in her bounty, has provided these. It is believed that Queensland alone could easily raise from 30,000,000 to 40,000,000 head of cattle without cultivating an acre of ground for fodder or spending a sixpence for the improvement of the natural pasturage."

Published statements from the Treasury show the large increase in the quantity of wool entered for consumption during the six months after the act of 1883 went into operation, namely, from July 1 to December 31, 1883, as compared with the corresponding period of the preceding year.

Of clothing-wool, amount paying duty in the six months ended December 31, 1882, 5,364,466 pounds. Amount in the six months ended December 31, 1883, 10,431,655 pounds. Increase nearly 100 per cent. (94.46 per cent. or 5,067,189 pounds).

The quantity so entered for consumption during the six months after the act went into operation, being 10,431,655 pounds, nearly equaled the quantity entered during the whole preceding year, that being 11,546,530 pounds.

Of combing-wool, the increase was more marked; the quantity paying duty during the six months ended December 31, 1882, was only 523,442 pounds, and only 1,373,114 pounds during the whole fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, while during the six months after the act went into operation the quantity that was entered for consumption was 2,664,456 pounds, being more than five times the quantity entered in the corresponding period of 1882, and nearly double that which was so entered during the entire fiscal year of 1882-'83.

Of carpet-wools the increase in six months was nearly 10,000,000 pounds, the relative figures being as follows: Entered for consumption in six months ended December 31, 1882, 24,769,229 pounds; six months ended December 31, 1883, 34,150,552 pounds; increase 38 per cent., 9,381,323 pounds.

It is worthy of mention that during the period of four months from March 3 to July 1, 1883, before the tariff act under consideration went into operation, the importation of foreign wool largely increased, and upon arrival was stored in bonded warehouses awaiting the 1st of July, on which day clothing and combing wools could be entered for consumption at a reduction in the rates of duty equal to about 10 per cent. ad valorem.

The quantity of wool remaining in the bonded warehouses of the United States on the 30th of June, 1883, was 26,972,660 pounds, the largest quantity being warehoused at Boston, 16,653,114 pounds, in the vicinity of the most extensive woolen mills of the country. Of the remaining 10,319,546 pounds, 8,665,121 were stored in New York warehouses.

Having shown that the reduction of the rates of duty on wools under the act of March 3, 1883, was greater than on woolen goods, and that this reduction caused a large increase in the quantity of foreign wools that entered into consumption during the six months ended December 31, 1883, as compared with the corresponding period of 1882, it is pertinent to inquire whether the reduced rates on woolen goods was sufficient to cause an extensive inflow from foreign countries.

Official returns made to the Treasury Department show that the value of woolen goods that entered into consumption during the first six months under the operation of the tariff act of 1883, as compared with the corresponding six months in the year immediately preceding, was as follows:

	Value.	Amount of duty.	Equivalent percentage ad valorem.
Six months ended December 31, 1882...	$22,400,387	$14,943,626	66.71
Six months ended December 31, 1883...	22,064,512	15,203,183	68.90
Decrease in 1883	335,875
Increase in 1883		259,557	2.19

From the above it will be observed that so far from being an increase in the value of woolen goods imported during the first six months under the new tariff, there was a slight decrease; and in place of a reduction in the average ad valorem duties there was an increase of over 2 per cent. This shows either that there was a decline in the value of woolen goods imported during the first half of the fiscal year 1883-'84, or that there was a considerable increase in those kinds of goods paying higher ad valorem rates of duty, as, for example, fine cloths, worsted goods, &c

PROTECTIVE POLICY OF GOVERNMENT.

Economists who have been in favor of protective legislation by the Congress of the United States have regarded it as of the highest importance that a protective tariff should not only serve to encourage manufacturing, mining, and agricultural industries, but should also in especial manner protect labor.

The low rates of wages paid to the working people in those countries that compete in our markets with domestic products and their sad condition are well known to the members of this committee, some of whom have personally investigated the condition of the toilers in the mills, factories, shops, and mines of Europe. To such gentlemen it is unnecessary to say that one of the principal objects of protective legislation is to prevent the degradation of our working people to the level of those in foreign countries.

In the manufacture of woolen goods great improvements in automatic and other machinery used have been made in recent years, until the number of human hands now employed in the various processes is comparatively small. In the vast products of woolen and worsted mills during the census year 1880, amounting in value to $267,262,913, the aggregate number of employés was only 161,557, and nearly 20,000 of these consisted of boys and girls under fifteen years of age. Highly important as this industry is, and deserving, as it does, ample encouragement from the National Legislature, its claim for protection, on the ground that it employs labor, is far surpassed by the wool-producing industry, an industry numbering 1,020,000 proprietors, who are the owners of 50,500,000 sheep, of an aggregate value of $250,000,000. These proprietors are, as a rule, freeholders, and the value of the land required for summer and winter feed for their flocks can not be estimated at less than $10 for each animal, thus aggregating $500,000,000. These flock-masters, in conducting their business, afford constant employment to more persons than they number themselves, the whole exceeding 2,000,000 persons.

The ingenuity of American inventors has not been able to provide automatic or other labor-saving machinery to diminish the number of employés. Men are required, strong, self-reliant men, in the successful prosecution of this industry. Neither boys nor women can endure the constant fatigue and vigilance attendant thereon. Here is an opportunity to encourage labor, and this labor, I beg your committee to remember, is not performed in buildings where the laborers are sheltered from storms, nor where the temperature is modified by artificial heat, but it is performed in the open air, where the laborers are exposed to the extreme heat of summer and to the extreme cold of winter, all of which must be endured.

Let me add that these laborers are extensive consumers of manufactured products, of protected articles of every description, woolen and cotton goods, clothing, boots and shoes, hats, fire-arms, cutlery, nails, iron and steel products of all kinds, sugar, rice, and everything that our country makes or produces, and by legislation protects, these agricultural laborers consume. The only material protection ever given them, or that they have seriously demanded, is that now under consideration. Do you expect to turn them away with the unphilosophical and fallacious theory that they are producers of "raw material," deserving no protection? Should you do so your answer will be, in my judgment, as crude as their production is "raw." But, gentlemen, treat them as you may, they are not only producers of wool, but they are men and patriots. They will contribute in the future as in the past toward the payment of your public debt and the replenishment of your Treasury, and should an enemy approach our shores, and money and muscle be needed for the preservation of our institutions, these humble sheep-farmers will give, as some of them have heretofore given, money, personal service, even their sons and their own right arms for the maintenance of the nation's integrity and honor.

THE COMPARATIVE EFFECT OF THE ACT OF MARCH 3, 1883, ON THE WOOL AND THE WOOLEN INDUSTRIES.

A comparison of the effect of the tariff act of March 3, 1883, on these two allied industries may not be out of place in an argument to show the justice and propriety of restoring the duties on wool as they were under the act of 1867.

It has already been stated that this act was the result of an agreement between the producers and manufacturers in wool. It was made after much consideration, and in order to settle a controversy between these two interests that had been coeval with their existence. In this controversy the manufacturers had always been victors and thereby had retarded the growth of sheep husbandry and diminished the production of domestic wool. This so-called agreement deserves a stronger name; it was a solemn compact for a union designed to be enduring, upon which the producers of wool might rely. Upon the faith of this treaty they did rely, and expended large sums of money in the prosecution of their business, thereby increasing its growth and advancing its prosperity with a rapidity almost marvelous, as has been shown by the facts and figures already submitted. The magnitude of the expenditures made by wool-growers, since the passage of the act in 1867, would, if stated, hardly be credited by those having no practical knowledge of the business. The act of March 3, 1883, was an abrogation of this treaty and without reason. It was really an act of divorce without cause and without alimony, and it deserves to be set aside and annulled, and the original treaty restored.

RELATIVE REDUCTION OF DUTIES ON WOOL AND ON WOOLENS.

A few facts and figures will show how the reduction of duties by the act of 1883 has affected the respective industries of wool-growing and wool-manufacturing, and the figures will substantiate some observations already made.

The comparative rates of duty on wools and on woolens under the respective tariff acts of 1867 and 1883, and the average ad valorem rates on each class of wool and on each of the classes or kinds of woolen goods separately and in groups, are shown by recent tables prepared by the Treasury Department. By these tables it is shown that, on the foreign wools that enter into competition with ours, namely, clothing and combing wools, the average reduction of duty was about 10½ per cent. On foreign manufactures of wool the average reduction was 6½ per cent. While, therefore, wool-growers have suffered so large a reduction in the protective duty on their product, with no compensatory advantages, the manufacturers of woolen goods have been largely compensated by the reduced price of wool, domestic as well as foreign, as I have already shown.

Of the $42,000,000 of woolen goods imported into the United States during the last fiscal year, ended June 30, 1883, dress goods constituted more than one-half, or $22,619,106, the duty on which, under the act of 1867, averaged 68¼ per cent. ad valorem. Under the act of 1883 the average would be 64½ per cent., being a reduction of only 4¼ per cent. The next in value was woolen cloths, amounting to $10,806,324, the average duty on which was 73.3 per cent., and under the present act it would be 64½ per cent., a reduction of 8.9 per cent. Of the other articles imported, no one exceeding $1,400,000 in value, the average reduction in duty under the act of 1883, as computed on the imports of the last fiscal year, was as follows: On manufactures of wool not specified, 9.92 per cent.; woolen and worsted yarns, only $433,363 in value, 10.68 per cent.; woolen and worsted shawls, 6.53 per cent.; wearing apparel, 9.45 per cent.; webbings, bindings, braids, &c., 7.15 per cent.; carpets, mats, rugs, 7.65 per cent.; shirts, hosiery, &c., 1.59 per cent.; shirts, drawers, and other articles, except hosiery, being only 1.03 per cent.

As already stated, the average ad valorem reduction on $40,837,565 of the total importation of woolen goods during the last fiscal year ($42,129,336) was only 6½ per cent., or, to be exact, 6.23 per cent.

It is respectfully submitted that if the wool-producing and wool-manufacturing industries are to be injured by legislation, no unfairness or unjust discrimination should be made by Congress. The relative interests of producer and manufacturer were carefully considered in 1866-'67, and the tariff act of 1867 was satisfactory to each alike, and as a result both have enjoyed prosperity.

Referring again to the reduction of the duty on clothing and combing wools, it has been asserted by some that the reduction in the dividing line in the value of wools paying 10 and 12 cents per pound respectively, from 32 to 30 cents, would, to a considerable extent, compensate wool-growers for the abolition of the ad valorem rates. This story might have been believed by the proverbially credulous marine, but no intelligent sailor or wool-grower believed it then or believes it now. The remorseless logic of figures fails to demonstrate the truth of the predicted result. The official returns, showing the duties paid upon wool during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, gives the following results: Clothing wools, value 32 cents or less per pound, 11,466,637½ pounds; value over 32 cents per pound, only 57,478 pounds, or one pound costing over 32 cents to every 199½ pounds costing less than 32 cents. In the aggregate imports from foreign countries during that year no wool is valued at above 25 cents per pound, except from Australia, from which country the direct importations amounted to 2,604,701 pounds, valued at $656,045, being an average cost of 25.2 cents per pound.

One of the reasons given by the manufacturers for insisting upon the reduction of the duties on wool is that it was necessary in order to compensate for the reduction of the duties on woolens. As a protectionist I have never been able to recognize the validity of this argument. These two productions, so far as legislative protection is concerned, stand upon their own respective merits. When properly considered I think it will be found that there is no logic in the assertion that because the duties on woolens are reduced the duty on wool should necessarily be reduced also. One who believes in the doctrine of protection does not admit that a protective duty upon an article produced in this country, where all the circumstances connected with its production are favorable, is necessarily increased in price to the extent of the duty.

The theory of the protectionist is that under the conditions above alluded to domestic competition will reduce the price of the article to the minimum cost of its production; that the protective duty is only a security to the domestic manufacturer that he shall not have his business destroyed by a temporary inundation from other countries, where capital is plentiful and labor cheap. The protective duty is simply a security to the manufacturer to induce him to invest his capital in a business which by domestic competition will produce an article as cheaply as it can be produced and at the same time furnish a market for it at home.

Now, the assertion of the manufacturers before alluded to, if it rests upon any logical basis, is a claim that by reducing the duty on wool they will cheapen the article for their own consumption, not for a single year, but as a rule for the future. Apply their logic to manufactured fabrics. Do they admit that the protection they receive increases the price of their goods? They have claimed for the last half a century that the reason for their demand for protection was not to increase the price of their goods, but to give them the command of their domestic markets and prevent their industries from being destroyed by overwhelming inundations from abroad. Hence they have always claimed, and have generally had, as they have at this moment, under the act of 1848, such protection as secures them against the calamity before referred to.

Any legislative duty that fails to secure to the domestic fabric the control of the home market fails to amount to protection. Apply this principle to the article of wool. As before stated, the duties of 1867 barely secured to the American producers the home market. Importations were made to some extent even unde the act of 1867, but that act gave to the producers of wool the control of the market at home; but the act of 1883 fails to do this. I do not say that its authors so intended, but I do say without fear of contradiction that under this law woolgrowers can not control the domestic market.

At this very point I invite the attention of the committee to the facts of the case as they have been heretofore presented to you. The 320,000,000 of pounds of wool, being the clip of 1883, have yielded to the producer this year an average of 4 cents less per pound than was received for the clip of 1882. Why? Because the tariff of 1883 fails to secure the home market to the producers and they are driven to this reduction in price in order to prevent importations, and unless they receive relief by legislation the producers will be compelled to make similar reductions from time to time, until finally they are driven to a choice either to continue in the production of wool at a price that is not remunerative or to gradually diminish and finally abandon the business. Surround this question by whatever figures and estimates you may, the simple fact remains as it is here stated. Hence the legislative authority of the United States must say whether they will suffer this industry to languish, decrease, and in certain places, notably Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, and Wisconsin, perish, or restore the tariff of 1867 and leave the wool-growers of the United States to the privilege of supplying the wool which the protected manufacturers consume.

I proceed to consider some of the other reasons given by the manufacturers to establish the proposition that the wool tariff of 1867 ought not to be restored. The president of the late Tariff Commission is reported to have said in a defense of the action of the last Congress that "The low condition of wool-growing in Ohio, the principal complaining State, is due to the competition in domestic territorial wools, and not to importation." I am unable to see how so intelligent a gentleman could have fallen into such grievous error. There is no wool grown in the Territories that competes with Ohio wool. Ohio wool, for certain purposes (by Ohio wool I mean that classification of wools which embraces those of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Michigan, and other central States) is the best wool in the world. It has no equal anywhere, and in the Territories it has not even a pretended competitor.

The States above named have expended most freely in the production of a superior quality of wool, and they were stimulated to such action by their belief in the beneficial effects in the act of 1867, and that the provisions of such act would be left undisturbed. They are prepared to keep their sheep in a uniform condition of flesh throughout the entire year, to house them when necessary for their protection from the severity of the weather, and to sustain them by a steady and judicious feeding. These are the elements which contribute to produce a wool of so strong a fiber that it is superior to any other wool in the world. The same sheep transferred to the Territories yield a tender, sometimes called a rotten, fiber, and although they are treated with the best care which intelligent husbandry can afford, yet it is impossible to bring their wool to such a standard as that it will favorably compare with the fine wools of Ohio. I am prepared with samples, which in due time I will hand to the committee, illustrating the statements I have here made.

The wool which most nearly approximates that which is classified under the name of Ohio XX and Ohio XXX is grown in Australia, of which also there is a sample present. This Australian wool is but a poor substitute for the wools of Ohio, Pennsylvania, &c., and in a scoured condition the domestic Ohio wool is always preferred to the best Australian production.

To verify the argument here made, I produce a letter from Justice, Bateman & Co., who are prominent wool commission merchants of Philadelphia, and by the permission of the writers I make use of the same:

122 SOUTH FRONT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, February 7, 1884.

DEAR SIR: We have been requested by Mr. David Harpster to furnish you samples of wool showing the difference between Territorial wool and Ohio XX, and we send them as follows:

Sample No. 1 is showy XX Ohio, well bred and sound in fiber, selling at 42 cents here.

Sample No. 2 is the same wool from Ohio sheep driven into the Western Territories, selling at 22 cents here.

This latter wool has had the best care and attention in the Territories, but owing to the alkaline soil, or from some unknown cause, the Territorial wool is weak and tender in fiber. Owing to the reduction of duties on wool, wool-growing in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia, where wool like our sample No. 1 is raised, is likely to be among the things of the past. This class of wool is much needed for the manufacture of worsted yarns. Large amounts of machinery for this purpose have been established in Philadelphia, but unless this wool can be raised in Ohio they will get other but less suitable from South America and Australia. The wools of the best blood after transfer to the Territories become rotten and tender in fiber and wholly unfit for worsted purposes. Sample No. 2 represents the wools transferred to the Territories. They will make some kinds of clothing, as they have fulling properties, but they are not strong. For worsted purposes, as above stated, they are wholly unfit.

Sample No. 3 is Australian. This wool is suitable for worsted purposes, although not as well adapted to it as wool like sample No. 1, Ohio wool, but if Ohio wool can not be had, American manufacturers will have to fall back on the foreign article like sample No. 3.

Yours, truly,

JUSTICE, BATEMAN & CO.

Mr. COLUMBUS DELANO,
1600 Thirteenth Street, Washington, D. C.

A second letter from the same parties, dated February 9, giving me leave to use the former letter, has been received, and from it I desire to make a few quotations: "The wools suitable to supply the wants of this machinery are raised principally in the above sections (Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, &c.). If wool-growing ceases to be profitable on high-priced lands, it will be transferred to the Western Territories, which do not produce wools of sufficient strength and fiber to answer for worsted purposes, and the manufacturers of worsted yarn will be compelled to import wool or close their mills. This event of course takes place when wool-growing in the old wool-growing sections becomes among the things of the past. We do not know whether it is the feed or the alkaline soil or what condition it is that unfits Territorial wools owing to weakness of fiber from ever being used, but the fact is well known.

* * * * * * *

"As the Western Territories are hardly likely to be plowed down and farmed and cultivated grasses produced, there is no reasonable expectation that they will grow the wools suitable for combing purposes which are now raised in the old wool-growing sections. There is no fine wool in the world equal to the high-bred XX and XXX Ohio, Pennsylvania, and West Virginia fleeces for strength of fiber; the Australian wools come next, and though they are not so strong, they are used largely by the American manufacturers, because they are cheaper than the Ohio wools; but at the same price in a scoured condition the manufacturers would always prefer the finest Ohio wools. Any material reduction of the duties on wool will have a tendency to make the raising of it unprofitable in the States named above, as manufacturers, in order to compete, must buy their wool at lower prices.

"The wool-grower and the woolen manufacturer are both interested in protection on both wool and goods. The American wool-grower depends upon the American woolen manufacturer for his market. American wool has been exported and tried both in England and France, but it was found better to pay return freight than to accept the best price obtainable in foreign markets."

Another error in the article before alluded to is contained in the following words:

"The total importation of clothing-wools, the competing foreign wools, in 1880, was 26,785,171 pounds, while Ohio has had to contend against an increased production of wool in the newer States from 1870 to 1880 of 101,000,000 pounds."

Here is the same error in fact reasserted under different circumstances. This paragraph admits that in 1880 there was 26,000,000 pounds of clothing-wool imported which competed with wools grown in Ohio, Pennsylvania, West Virginia, &c. But looking further at the article from which those quotations are made we find the same author asserting as follows:

"The only wools now imported are for exceptional and peculiar purposes, wools having qualities not found or not so perfectly found in domestic wools; carpet-wools, none of which are grown or can be grown profitably here; superfine electoral wools for the highest face-goods; English combing-wools, when as in 1880 there was a fashion for coarse fabrics; long and fine merino combing-wools, produced here as yet in limited quantities, for soft ladies' fabrics which have recently come into fashion."

I am unable to understand how the author justifies himself in asserting that the low condition of wool-growing in Ohio is due to the competition in domestic Territorial wools, when he admits in another paragraph that in 1880 nearly 27,000,000 pounds of clothing-wools were imported; nor do I exactly see how these two statements are consistent with the paragraph last stated, wherein he says that "the only wools now imported are for exceptional and peculiar purposes," &c.

There is one other paragraph in the article referred to to which I wish to invite attention. It is in these words:

"Although we may import limited supplies of foreign wool, the ample domestic supply regulates the cost of such raw material as we may import."

In this proposition there is a subtle error, which can not be concealed when exposed to criticism. How can an "ample domestic supply regulate the cost of importations," provided the foreign article can be imported without duty, or under such low duty as to permit its sale at a price so low as to render the production of the domestic article unremunerative? The proposition is clearly untenable and palpably erroneous. In fact, the very reverse is true, as I think all must see, namely: That a market which permits an article to be imported duty-free or with a nominal duty will be regulated by the price of the imported product; and the price of a domestic article must be regulated by the cost of that which is imported; and a reduction in the price of the domestic article is necessary to prevent or limit importation. Therefore, nothing can save the wool-growers from this reduction in price which they have endured during the year 1883 except the restoration of duties that will enable them to command the home market; otherwise the abandonment of the industry must inevitably follow.

Mr. VAN EATON. Mr. Chairman, as a nation we occupy the singular position of being a sufferer from a redundant revenue, our Treasury suffers from an embarrassment of riches, while our people groan under the burdens of unjust, unnecessary, and onerous taxation. Attention has been called to this state of things in more than one executive message, in more than one report from the Secretary of the Treasury.

In his annual message to the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress, December 4, 1882, after showing that there was a surplus of revenue in the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, of $145,543,810.71, the President said:

You can not fail to note with interest the discussion by the Secretary as to the necessity of providing by legislation some mode of freeing the Treasury of an excess of assets in the event Congress fails to reach an early agreement for the reduction of taxation.

I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government.

It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise of the country from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. * * * Of late the public revenues have far exceeded what was necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government.

Then comes the report of that remarkable body, commonly known as the "Tariff Commission." Let me quote from that. On page 5 of that report, bearing the same date as the annual message just quoted from, we find the following:

Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by mere indiscriminate popular clamor, but by the best conservative opinion of the country.

* * * * * * *

Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards not only as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers, but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction.

* * * * * * *

It would seem that the rates of duties under the existing tariff—fixed for the most part during the war, under the evident necessity at that time of stimulating to its utmost extent all domestic production—might be adapted, through reduction, to the present condition of peace, requiring no such extraordinary stimulus.

* * * * * * *

Entertaining these views the commission has sought to present a scheme of tariff duties, in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction of rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent.

This, then, was the reduction which the commission thought ought to be made in the then existing tariff; that is, 25 per cent.

In his annual message to the present Congress, December 4, 1883, quoting from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the President showed that for the year ending July 1, 1883, the surplus of revenue over expenditures was $132,879,444.41. True, it is estimated that for the fiscal years ending July 1, 1884 and 1885, the surplus income will not be so large.

Now, the very moderate reduction recommended by the commission was not adopted. The Republican majority in both Houses repudiated the work of their own creature. True to their long history on this subject, they determined to stand by the manufacturers, and not to afford the "relief to the consumer," which the commission said ought to be done. After long wrangling, and the rejection of every measure of relief offered on this side, a bill was finally passed, which, according to the best estimates, reduced the then existing tariff rates 1.74 per cent. The committee had recommended a reduction of 25 per cent.; this legislation came within 23.26 per cent. of that recommendation!

Now, then, we find the situation to be this: We have an overflowing Treasury, an annual surplus of $100,000,000 or over, more than we actually need; recommendations time after time from the Executive and the minister of finance to devise and put in practice some plan to reduce this annually recurring surplus; a commission created at the instance of the dominant party purposely to investigate all matters connected with the tariff, who, after carefully going over the whole ground—and a large portion of the United States—finally reported that tariff rates should be reduced 25 per cent. "as a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers;" and yet in all these years no substantial reduction has been effected—certainly no "measure of relief" has been adopted up to this good hour. And now, when by the pending bill it is proposed to reduce war-tariff taxes 20 per cent.—less than the commission itself recommended, and in exact line of all the recommendations of which I have spoken—we have the extraordinary spectacle presented of an almost unbroken phalanx of opposition on the other side of this Chamber, to the moderate reduction proposed by the bill, and to any "measure of justice to the consumer."

I am not unmindful, of course, that there has been a reduction in the revenues of perhaps from thirty to forty millions annually, but neither am I unmindful how this reduction has been effected, namely, by reductions in the internal revenue, by a removal of the tax on just such articles as the people, the consumers, could dispense with. Such were the taxes on bank checks, proprietary medicines, matches, perfumery, Lubin's extract Jockey Club, and reduction of the tax on tobacco. While on all such things as the people, the laboring men and women of this country, those upon whose shoulders after all everything else rests and the prosperity of the country depends—on all such things as they must buy and use—the tax remains the same; the burden for them is not lightened, but in the language of the Boston Post, "Everything for them to wear, to eat, and make shelter remains taxed all the same, and in many cases the exactions are so outrageously high that even a Government mule must be ashamed that so grand a country as the United States could impose them!"

The fact is, that while reduction in some sort has been forced upon the dominant party, they have most carefully looked for and so far as they have gone, found some place to put it where it would not interfere with the large manufactures, "our infant industries," and most carefully would offer no "measure of justice to the consumers." So true is this that to-day, when the necessity of further reduction of revenue still presses, we find the leading opponents of the bill on either side of this Chamber, in harmonious accord in recommending the abolition of the whisky tax—internal revenue on distilled spirits. When the people ask bread they would give them not a stone, but worse, plenty of free whisky. Mr. Chairman, I confess I can not understand the statesmanship that would keep up to the highest notch the prices of all the necessaries of life, and when the laboring man is in distress, and the "poor cry in the streets," would offer as the only "measure of relief and justice" unlimited free and cheap whisky.

On this subject of the tax on whisky I wish to say I prefer it should become the settled policy of the Government to raise a portion of its revenue from a tax on spirits distilled from grain. I want to see the mode of collection changed, the internal-revenue machinery done away with, but not this particular tax; it is one, Mr. Chairman, which no one need pay unless he wishes; to escape it all he has to do is to refrain from the use of the article. It is perhaps as a tax the least oppressive of any that could be devised. So let us keep the tax on whisky and take it off our food and clothing.

TARIFF FACTS FOR POOR MEN.

The New York Herald is doing some good work in the cause of reform, and recently published some facts and tables which I quote:

If the workingman can not own his cottage and the land on which it stands, the next best thing is to have possession of them at a low rental. The price of land itself is not affected directly by the tariff, being with sunlight and air one of the very few things that are not taxed. If there had been any possible method of "protecting" land by screwing out of the workingman a part of his scanty earnings, it would doubtless have been applied long since. If the materials that enter into the construction of a house are taxed, the cost of the house will be increased and the owner or landlord must charge a higher rent to secure a profit on his outlay. Let the following list of duties in the present tariff be examined:

	Per cent.
Nails	100
Lumber	18
Common window-glass	60
Linseed-oil	41
White lead	54
Wall-paper	25
Cement	20
Slates	25
Laths	9
Shingles	14

It is said the tariff is imposed on behalf of the workingman. Does this look like it?

Suppose a worker in a mill has saved enough to buy a modest little cottage, to which he takes his wife and children. He is not getting much for his labor, enough to support himself and family, and the expense of furnishing is quite an item. He wants to have his money go as far as possible, and cheap—that is, low-priced—goods are what he wants. Let us see how the tariff meets his wishes and to what extent it applies:

	Per cent.
Carpets	50
Oil-cloths	40
House furniture, finished	35
House furniture, unfinished	30
Clocks	30
Books	25
Earthenware	40
Glassware	55
Tin utensils	45
Chromos	25

Can it be imagined that these taxes are imposed to aid the workingman to furnish his house? Suppose they did not exist, would it not be reasonable to think that the cost of furnishing would be decreased?

In order to live, a man must eat, must be clothed, and must have shelter. In this estimate these are the necessities of life, and if their cost is made greater than is necessary it practically involves a tax upon life. Let us take some of the important articles of clothing and see how the tariff is arranged:

	Per cent.
Clothing wools	26 to 73
Flannels	62 to 68
Hats	30
Leather	20
Gloves and mittens (cotton)	35
Linens	35

These are articles used by every man, woman, and child in the country, and are necessary to their comfort. See how tenderly they are cared for by the tariff! The wonder is that such a system of taxation on the poor is allowed to remain one day.

But we are told the result of a high protective tariff is to reduce the price of the manufactured article to the consumer. Well, Mr. Chairman, if that be so, we have the extraordinary spectacle presented in this country of vast capital controlled by men of brains and energy, invested in protected industries for the sake alone of "most sweet charity," for the sole benefit of the consumer. For, if protection cheapens prices, free trade would of course, as would any reduction, increase them, and if the capitalists of the country engaged in manufacture, should ever conclude to quit investing for charity and want to add to their capital, of course they will join forces with us, and thus increase the price of their commodities and add to their profits.

That there may be periods when manufactured articles become cheap under protection, I admit; but these are spasmodic, not regular, and occur when under the hot-bed stimulus of protection there is overproduction and financial troubles threaten, and goods are forced on a glutted market.

Again we are told "protection" is for the benefit of the laboring classes. What laboring classes? First, and chiefly, of course, those who work in the protected industries. To hear the advocates of protection on this subject, one would suppose that in their favorite theory they believed they had found the workingman's paradise; this I think the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day prescribed as the panacea for all the ills such as he observed in foreign countries, notably in "merry free-trade England." According to their views, there will always be high wages and prosperity under the beneficent influences of protection, where poverty and want and "the cheap and nasty" can never come. Mr. Chairman, in this connection I desire to call attention to matters of recent date concerning these "protected" laborers, as shown in extracts from the current news of the day and as found in the daily papers.

In the first place, I presume it will be admitted that we have the protective system in pretty full force and effect; that we are and for years have been enjoying (?) a rather high protective tariff; yet I venture to say for the last year or more, in spite of the vast benefits of the system, the distress consequent on the reduction of the wages of the protected laborers, has been unparalleled by anything that has happened among laborers in other callings not so favored and protected. Read the following from the press dispatches of last fall and this spring:

NO COMPROMISE IN THE GLASS STRIKE.

PITTSBURGH, December 18.

The general conference committee of the glass manufacturers and their striking employés met again to-day. The committee continued in session until a late hour this evening, and adjourned without accomplishing anything. Both sides agree that further attempts to compromise will be useless, and the question is now one of endurance. The workmen say that the manufacturers will weaken after January 1. The manufacturers pronounce talk of that kind rubbish. The feeling to-night is more bitter than at any time since the strike commenced.

THE NAIL MEN IN COUNCIL.

PITTSBURGH, December 19.

The Western Nail Association met this morning and held a session lasting until 2 o'clock this afternoon. It was decided to close down for six weeks, from December 29 to February 11. The meeting was one of the largest ever held here, every mill in the West being represented in person or by letter. The stoppage is for the purpose of restricting the production. The stocks are light and ill-assorted, but the trade is reported to be fair. The card rate remains unchanged. The stoppage will throw several thousand men out of employment. The manufacturers hope by the suspension to improve the trade. The employés are very despondent, having already lost nearly four months this year by similar suspensions.

This afternoon 3,000 men employed in the National Tube Works at McKees port were notified of a general reduction on January 1. If the terms are not accepted the works will close down indefinitely after that date.

CUTTING DOWN THE WAGES.

NORRISTOWN, PA., December 24.

James Hoover & Sons and J. H. Boone & Co., iron manufacturers, announce a reduction in the price of puddling from $4 to $3.75 a ton, the wages of others being proportionately reduced.

MOUNT CARMEL, PA., December 24.

Work is suspended at No. 1 Franklin Colliery, near Trevorton, for three months, five hundred men being disemployed.

EASTON, PA., December 24.

The Thomas Iron Company, at Hokendauqua, and the Crane Iron Company, at Catasauqua, reduce the wages of employés 10 per cent. January 1. Nearly every furnace in the valley has reduced wages.

TAUNTON, MASS., December 24.

The Whittenton Manufacturing Company reduces wages 10 per cent. on January 7, and other mill managers say they must cut or shut down.

COTTON MILLS CLOSING.

NEW YORK, January 31.

A report is current that orders have been issued to stop a large number of looms in the Boom cotton-mills, Tremont and Suffolk mills, Massachusetts Cotton mills, the Lowell, Massachusetts and York Manufacturing Company mills, and Saco mine, in order to reduce production, because of the present unprofitable prices. The above are some of the largest mills in the country and represent nearly 400,000 spindles.

A THREATENED STRIKE OF IRON-WORKERS.

PITTSBURGH, PA., April 19.

The conference of the Amalgamated Association and the manufacturers this afternoon, contrary to expectation, resulted in a disagreement. The workmen demanded that the present rate of wages, $5.50 per ton of puddling, be continued, with the exception of an extra dollar a ton for axle-iron, which was dropped, and also presented additions and amendments, which it is claimed will increase the wages of certain classes of workmen from 5 to 20 per cent. The manufacturers peremptorily refused to accept the workmen's proposition and demanded a uniform reduction of 10 per cent., which it is claimed is necessary on account of Eastern competition and the depression of trade.

The workmen denied that a reduction was necessary, and also denied that their scale provided for any increase.

The discussion lasted three hours, when it was decided that an agreement was impossible. Both sides profess to be firm in their position. If one or the other does not yield work will be suspended at all mills in the West after June 1.

And these extracts might be multiplied almost indefinitely. And, Mr. Chairman, after listening to the glowing eulogies of the protective system, especially of its beneficent results to the laboring man, toward whom the sympathies of eulogists and manufacturers alike seem to go out, the above is rather strange reading. Oh, wondrous system, that at once cheapens to the consumer the cost of the article produced, increases the wages of the laborer, and at the same time forces hundreds out of employment in one establishment, thousands in sundry others, and often works on half time most of those who remain!

Right here, and in connection with this subject, another strange thing occurs to me. For the past two years we have been hearing repeated complaints of the importation by the wealthy proprietors of the various "protected industries" of cheap laborers from Europe. These men have been telling us for years that they desire protection in order to prevent American labor from having to compete with "the pauper labor of Europe"—I think that is about the way they put it—and now they are actually introducing that same "pauper labor" into this country, and employing it, because it can be had for less than the American labor they have forced to the striking point, by constant reduction of wages, while in the mysterious process of protection.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] the other day made this remarkable recommendation:

We should forthwith prohibit the importation of cheap labor and send back to whatever country they have been shipped from men or women who have signed contracts in foreign lands or on shipboard to work at lower than prevailing American wages.

Again he says:

Statutory provision should be made that eight hours or less shall be the longest period in any one day that man or machinery may move in productive employment.

So, then, the confession is openly made on the floor of this House, and by the acknowledged leader on that side, that after all "protection" alone will not make the American laborer in the "productive employments" happy; another step is necessary; first, the "infant industry" must be protected, that this American laborer may not be forced into competition with the "pauper labor of Europe;" and next, we must pass laws to prevent his "protector" from bringing this same pauper labor to our own shores to compete on American soil with that American laborer; and finally, we must then provide by still another law that this same protected industry shall not overwork this much-protected, this same American laborer!

But, after all, there is really nothing strange in this. Once set out on the tortuous path of making men prosperous or virtuous by law and there is no end to the laws that will be needed. Properly considered, all this is but the logical sequence to the doctrine of "protection." That alone is soon found insufficient. Its advocates will not see that the fault is in the system, and they come back here for more laws, more help, and more protection! And so they will ever come, until the people rise up and do away with the whole thing. I do not think the workings or philosophy of the protective system can be better portrayed than in the following extract from a most excellent work, Economics, or the Science of Wealth, by Julian M. Sturtevant, ex-president and professor of political economy in Illinois College, and one of the most successful teachers and profound thinkers of the age:

No one will deny that it is possible that a single branch of industry might be encouraged and stimulated into more rapid growth by the monopoly of protection. Let us suppose that up to a certain time free trade had prevailed, when persons interested in establishing some new industry had found foreign competition inconvenient, and applied to Government for a protective duty. The Government grants the request, and the revenue law is modified accordingly. The petitioners go away for the present satisfied. Let us suppose that these petitioners were manufacturers of woolen cloth. The wool-growers are not slow to discover that on the one hand they are obliged to pay more for woolen cloths, while on the other hand they are severely pressed by the competition of foreign-grown wool. They apply for protection, and it can not be refused. This takes away a part of the value of the privileges conceded to the manufacturers of wool, and they are discontented.

The principle of protection is now established, and every industry which encounters any foreign competition will demand and can not be denied a show in it. The iron men of every grade must be protected, and every dime of protection which is granted to them increases the price of machinery for the manufacture of woolens, and thus damages the woolen interest. The cotton men, too, must be heard. They have to pay higher wages to their laborers, because the cost of living has been increased. Workmen in this climate must have woolen clothing. The cost of machinery is increased, and therefore it costs more to manufacture cotton goods. They, too, must be protected. Soon the woolen interest has lost more by monopolies granted to other industries than it gained by the one originally granted to itself, and it besieges the Government more clamorously than ever for more protection and with a more powerful argument. It now wants to be protected not so much against foreign competition as against the monopolies granted to other industries. These, one and all, are soon again thronging the lobbies of Congress demanding more protection.

The privilege granted to one industry is destructive of that granted to every other, and no man can tell to-day whether his particular industry is on the whole benefited or injured by the protection which actually exists, or whether if the whole were at once swept away his interest would not be actually relieved of an oppressive burden. But all still worship with unfaltering faith at the shrine of exclusiveness and clamor for more protection as the panacea for all their ills. The coal interest must have protection, however much that may injure the iron interest; and the iron interest must have protection, however that may affect the woolen and the cotton interest. If protectionists could demonstrate some great law of nature by which it might be determined with accuracy when and to what amount protection should be granted, the whole thing might be reduced to law and order and reason. But till that can be done (and it never can be done) it will present a scene of wild confusion, self-contradiction, and self-destruction.

How well this delineates what has been happening here every day since Congress met in December last! I reckon it is safe to say that not an industry in the United States, except that of the farmer pure and simple, and some of the manual mechanical industries, but what has been here howling for protection, sometimes more for themselves, sometimes less for their neighbors. In fact, so many of our "infant industries" have thronged these Halls and crowded crying through these corridors, that were this whole immense building converted into a hospital for the feeble or an asylum for the young, it would scarcely accommodate these distressed and in most instances aged infants. Their cry is "Give!" and, like that of the daughter of the horse-leech, it is still "Give!"

Among others came the sugar men. These went home and called a convention of the "representatives of the Louisiana protected industries," and made a report, which they printed and sent back here. I quote from the report of Judge Taylor Beattie, who, in speaking of their trip here, says:

At first we experienced some difficulty in securing a hearing, but finally met the Louisiana delegation to the House of Representatives. They for the most part seemed averse to any combination with other Representatives. In fact they seemed to think the sugar-planters were not the proper parties to advise them; that they understood these matters better than we did. They seemed to have something on their minds which they were averse to talking about, but which we supposed meant that they were to be governed in their action by the dictates of some caucus, which had been held or was to be held. We told them we were satisfied by a combination of votes we could prevent the passage of the Morrison bill. We stated to them one fact which came to us from * * *, and which was a bid for our vote, that if we could deliver the five votes from Louisiana [one, KELLOGG, they had already], they * * * would guarantee fifteen votes [from Ohio], representing the wool interest, to prevent the passage of the bill. The members of the Louisiana delegation were averse to making any combinations whatsoever.

How unaccommodating in the Louisiana delegation, not to be willing to trade sugar for wool, and in the proportions of one for three at that! There is much more of the same kind. And how innocently it is all said! Only a much-protected infant would be quite so unsophisticated!

In their resolutions they solemnly declare "against periodic inundation and slave-grown products." Under the circumstances, the irony of protection could scarcely go further than this. And, finally, that they "will arrange for an electoral ticket and Congressional nominations, and will support no one not fully in accord with their views!"

Then came the wool men and the sorghum men, and we were told sorghum could be made to pay in Kansas if only that sweet infant could be protected. Then came the licorice-paste men, and the lumber men, and the rice men—in fact, their name is legion—and the iron and steel men; but no, they did not come exactly, for, as is said of the poor, these "we have always with us." In connection with the sugar interest I shall ask leave to print, as part of the appendix to my remarks, an article from the American Grocer of March 27, this year.

But we are told that we have other industries in the South that demand and must have protection. Mr. Chairman, I glory in our Southern industries, factories, mines, and so on, but I undertake to say that in our genial climate they are not the puling infants it seems they are and must ever remain on the arid hills and under the bleak skies of New England. I have no fears but our people will so adapt themselves to the situation that, as the artificial stimulus of protection is withdrawn, they will grow all the stronger in the natural and healthy air of approximate free trade, and building up their industries, untrammeled by restrictive laws and repressive enactments, allowed to buy, sell, and trade where they will, and according to the great and unchanging laws of commerce, all their industries will not only survive, but flourish and possibly illustrate the doctrine of the "survival of the fittest."

The Tariff Commission on their travels through the South, in addition to the rice men and the sugar men, who plead that they could not live if duties on their particular industries were reduced, while they could live much better if they were raised, found when they got into North Carolina an enterprising farmer who thought and actually convinced them that the tax on goobers, or peanuts, ought to be raised to 2 cents per pound, and who also asked for a duty on chalk, as he said chalk deposits existed in that State. True, we get all our chalk from England in ballast, or nearly so, but the idea seemed to be to put a duty on the article and stop the ballast, and our North Carolina farmer was right; he had as good a right to have his peanuts and his chalk protected as his neighbors their rice and their sugar.

But on the question of the necessity for protection for the manufacturing and mining enterprises of the South I call attention to a letter (see appendix) from R. L. Bloomfield, esq., president of the Athens Manufacturing Company, of Georgia, a man as well qualified to speak on this subject as any man in the country, and this is only one of several of the same import received by the Committee on Ways and Means and all denying the benefit of protection for Southern industries. Its reasoning applies with like force to all industries in the South supposed to be in need of protection.

Mr. Chairman, these questions are here in the Forty-eighth Congress as clamorous as in the past, and they will continue to come until a settled policy is adopted. These troublesome matters on questions of public policy should be definitely settled, and they can be settled in only one of two ways. The one is to erect a wall of protection so high that nothing made or raised in this country can be imported, shut every interest up within these walls, and come squarely to the extreme protectionist's idea of a prosperous government, of a sea-girt Utopia, when all we produce, and all we manufacture, and all we draw from the mines will be bought, sold, and consumed "under the American flag!" The other is, gradually but surely to approach taxation only for the support of the Government. I do not believe there is any middle ground; I do not believe there is any warrant in the Constitution, in right, reason, or law, for taking money under color of law from one man's pocket and putting it into that of another, thus making the poor man and the laborer poorer and the rich man richer, and I believe the people are waking up to this fact.

Mr. Chairman, in all this protracted debate I have listened carefully to arguments from the other side. I have heard eloquently portrayed the beauties of protection and its manifold blessings to the laboring poor, and as I listened my mind involuntarily went out to the toilers in the fields in the far South, for in my section the people are mostly engaged in agricultural pursuits, and I have tried in vain to see how these beauties of protection add to their happiness, their comfort, or their well-being in any respect. They do not see it themselves, for as yet they are unlearned in the protectionist's political economy, that the true way for the laboring man to prosper is to sell in a cheap market and buy in a dear one.

True, I suppose they are not of much account in the making up of this great argument; they do not count in it as do the laborers of Sheffield, of Birmingham, of Manchester, and the wretched dwellers in the "slums of London," whose miseries a few days since were so eloquently portrayed on this floor for the purpose of pointing the moral that their condition was the result of free trade; but nevertheless let us turn to them for a moment. Take, for example, the colored laborer—and for him at least gentlemen on the other side once professed to feel a peculiar interest—and do yet I believe about election time—take, I say, for a moment the colored laborer in the cotton field or the woods, away down there by the lower Mississippi, the Pearl, the Pascagoula, the Amite, or the Gulf, and as he drives his team afield, hoes his cotton, or plows his corn let us see, if we can, how protection protects this sable man and brother.

Not one thing he raises is "protected" or has its price enhanced by any tariff rates, while not one thing he buys but is protected and has its cost to him enhanced thereby; and here the question of "free trace-chains," so sneeringly referred to the other day, does have some significance. Doubtless there are many on this floor who have never felt the crushing weight of poverty, the actual necessity of making a dollar go as far as possible; but there are such men, and this our Southern laborer is one of them, and it is a serious matter to him to have to pay two prices for an article he must have, whether trace-chains, shoes, clothing, or sugar, in order that the proprietor in these favored and protected industries may grow rich off his necessities. That is the only phase of protection ever exhibited to the farm laborer, to the carpenter, the blacksmith, the mason, to all engaged in mechanical as well as agricultural pursuits. These are the men whose cause I plead. I ask that they be left free to buy where they can buy cheapest and sell where they can sell dearest; that this miserable net-work of so-called protective laws that hems them in on every side for the benefit of the favored few be torn asunder, and the laboring man once more become a free man in fact as well as in name.

And Mr. Chairman, the laboring man is not insensible to these evils he has so long had to endure, and everywhere he is moving to get rid of them. I think it were the part of wisdom to recognize this fact, to prepare for the coming and the inevitable change; for in our form of government what the people will, must come to pass; they are our masters, we are but their servants; in the end we must register their decrees. "The question before the legislators of to-day is simply whether they will lead or be led; whether they will respond to the demand for reform. Reform will come. Welcome it." That the revolution on this subject has fairly begun only the willfully blind can fail to see, and "revolutions never go backward."

Protection as it exists in our system must go. It is the part of statesmen to prepare for the change. If this is done, if we obey the behests of the people, if we mark well the signs of the times, if we skillfully put our house in order, the change will come so gradually that not a protected industry in the country need suffer. On the contrary, they too shall share in the benefits that must come when all our varied industries—agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and mining—instead of crippling each other as now, shall work together for the common good, each adding to the prosperity of the other, and resulting in the added happiness and permanent prosperity of all classes and of all callings. Then, and not till then, shall we be truly free. The time is not long; the army of reform, of true progress, is fast organizing; it gathers recruits in every section, in the very walls of the factories and in the depths of the mines as well as from the forge and the plow; it is on its march.

Dinna ye hear the slogan?

Nothing can stop it. Let us not try; let us rather prepare to welcome it.

APPENDIX.

MY DEAR SIR: The tariff bill which is now pending at Washington gives me much interest, and as I know you to be an intimate friend of many gentlemen of both Houses, I concluded you to be the most proper one to make my views known to that body touching the manufacturing interest of Georgia, which I understand has been represented as wholly joined to the idol which many manufacturers claim to be their own salvation. So far from holding to these views I claim all protection to manufacturing of every kind a direct injury. I would as soon think that a man could get life from whisky as for a manufacturer to get life from protection. Do not profits increase competition, and does not competition decrease profits? Do not tariffs tend to increase values, and do not increasing values increase cost of production? Was not the tariff decreased one year ago, and do you not see its effects in the reduction in wages to cheapen production? Reduce the tariff on every article and you will soon find it cheapened, and you will find its production cheapened, and the effect of this will be to place your products in the markets of the world in place of keeping them crowded up in a protected market.

The stimulant given to the manufacturing interest by a high tariff has called an undue amount of labor and capital from the profitable pursuits of this country and placed them in unprofitable employments, which not only render themselves unprofitable to themselves but also to all others by having to support them with a bounty to keep them in their positions, which, as I have said above, is unprofitable for the bounty receiver and the bounty payer. It is simply beyond the power of men to make much profits in this country from any vocation of life if he is forced to meet the markets of the world with his products, I care not what his business may be, simply because his cost of production is too great; and now it has become apparent from the fact that at the close of a four years' war the country was left comparatively bare of productions, and it took the past years for us to collect a stock and provide for the large population annually thrown upon our shores, which must be supplied for at least one year. This work has kept us trading among ourselves, and as my old uncle used to say, we made a good business of it, as his neighbor did, who would trade with his son Bill on rainy days and make each a dollar.

Now that our protected market is supplied we are at our row's end; we can not enter a single market outside and prosper. It was perfectly amusing to me to see in the convention held at Rochester, N. Y., the wool-growers and the wool-spinners each clamoring for reduction of tariff, one on the goods and the other on the wool. The grower said, give me cheap goods and we will give you cheap wool; and the spinner said give us cheap wool and we will give you cheap goods; and finally they compromise, each getting from the other all the duty they could squeeze out of him, caring for no others but themselves. And this is just the spirit that conceived the first tariff, and tyrannical power was what first gave it birth. Let us examine this question and see how it enters every department of life. Say an ax will cost to import it $1; we add 50 cents duty, making cost $1.50; add to this importer's profit or commission 5 per cent.; this makes $1.57½; add to this jobber's profit 10 per cent., you have $1.73½; add to this 25 per cent. retail profit, and you have $2.16½. The man who makes the ax gets $1, the Government gets 50 cents, less the cost of collection. Who gets the balance, 66½ cents? The merchants get it for advancing the tax for the use of that ax. Well, the user of the ax can not afford to lose that amount, and he must charge more for his wood in consequence. The blacksmith who purchases the wood can not afford to lose it, hence he must charge more for upsetting the ax when brought to him for repair, and now the ax ceases to be profitable with its second duty laid on it; axes are too expensive for wood-cutting, and the man must leave wood-cutting and go into a protected business in order to live; he finds a business which does not draw a bounty can not furnish a living. We soon find the protected business with an undue share of labor and money invested in it, and that's unprofitable.

What now must be done—destroy their idol, protection? Oh, no; we can not live without this protection. We are resolved what to do. Work half time; the wages must remain where they are. We can not live on less, but we will work on half time until the market becomes bare. This they prescribe for the remedy of the evil. It is not a remedy, only a relief. If any man knows anything of the mechanic's life in the Middle or New England States for the past two years, he knows that they have not had work much over half their time, simply because the articles they produce are higher than the masses can purchase. The purchasing power is not in the country. The necessities are apparent in all rural districts, but they are unable to fill their necessities. Think for one moment that this country, the plains of Texas, should be paid a bounty for raising wool after giving them the land; the plains of Kansas and Nebraska should be paid a bounty for raising cattle; the savannas of Georgia and South Carolina a bounty of 100 per cent. for raising rice; the valley of the Mississippi 25 per cent. for raising sugar. This is nothing but robbing each the other, and like all species of selfishness, we have a watchful eye on what goes in the pocket, but entirely blind at what goes out. I think I have said enough to convince any honest, disinterested mind; but nothing of what I have said ever convinced my mind of the wickedness of protection.

From 17 years of age I have always loved the government best which bestowed to the keepers of its laws the most personal liberty, and I never felt myself free when my Government denied me the privilege to sell my labor in the market where it was most needed and purchase my supplies in that market which was best supplied. Give men their liberty, and the natural advantages which each and every country is supplied with, and my word for it men will make for themselves good and wholesome livings; but my experience goes to prove that government is oftener a hinderance than a help when they undertake to assist individuals in individual pursuits. The adjusting of our tariff in a just and fair proportion between man and man is beyond the power of man, and therefore plain to my mind that it can not be justly laid. I fail to see any good in the institution, view it from whatever side I may; and while I could not ask perhaps to have the institution wiped entirely out at one blow, fearing the consequence might be the same as removing all impurities from my body in an instant, before their place could be supplied by purity I would thereby suffer more than the system could bear. I would purge it out by healthful doses until the whole body was cleansed. I fear you will complain of the length of this letter, but you know my story is not half told. I close simply from fear of wearying you.

Respectfully,

R. L. BLOOMFIELD.

Hon. POPE BARROW.

FREE SUGAR.

The following extract is from a prize essay read before the Planters' Association of Louisiana. If its statements are true, and we have no reason to doubt them, they prove that domestic sugar-growers are receiving greater returns from their crops than is obtained by any other class of agriculturists:

"No agricultural product in any part of the world gives a return equal to a well-conducted sugar plantation. Hitherto it has required large capital to embark in this business, but since the establishment of central factories in our State every cultivator has within his reach the means to become a sugar farmer and the certainty of obtaining a good price for his cane. Poor men in no other country have such opportunities as are here offered, for by proper cultivation they are certain of securing from $80 to $100 per acre for their cane crop, and one man can cultivate from ten to fifteen acres in cane, besides raising corn and other supplies sufficient for his family—all on land which to-day can be purchased at from $5 to $20 per acre. This new feature in the sugar industry is destined to more than double our sugar product in five years, and under favorable legislative protection this industry in the near future will assume grand proportions, for not one-half of the territory adapted to cane is as yet cultivated in this plant. It has been found that cane does remarkably well on the high lands, as proven in East Baton Rouge by sugar farmers, who are growing wealthy with small mills; and cane pays well even in the sandy soil of the other Florida parishes, where nourished by fertilizers. Recent important improvements in machinery have greatly increased the sugar yield per ton of cane, and the refuse, or bagasse, which a few years ago was a great burden to sugar planters, has recently been utilized for fuel; but a better use for it will soon be found, for it makes the best paper stock, and will in a year or two be extensively employed for that purpose. In fact, paper barrels for sugar and molasses will soon take the place of the ancient, wasteful, and cumbersome cypress hogsheads and barrels."

An average duty of over 60 per cent. is maintained on sugar and kept at that excessive rate in obedience to the demands of the domestic sugar industry.

It is claimed in the above paper that with proper cultivation $80 to $100 per acre is obtained from sugar. The tobacco crop of 1882 paid $64.32 per acre; hay, $11.44; potatoes, $43.89; corn, $11.94; wheat, $11.99; rye, $8.28; oats, $9.89; barley, $13.54; buckwheat, $9.49. These figures show conclusively that there is no necessity for a high tariff on sugar, and that as a crop it yields the producer six to eight times the return obtained from cereals. And yet the average rate of wages in the grain-growing States of the West and Northwest is from six to eight dollars per month greater than in Louisiana. Free sugar would still enable producers to get superb returns from their land as compared with grain-growers, and give to consumers a gift of $40,000,000.

CAPITAL INVESTED IN SOUTHERN MANUFACTURING AND MINING ENTERPRISES.

BALTIMORE, March 5.

The Manufacturers' Record will to-morrow publish a statement of two months' progress in manufactures in the South, showing the amount of capital invested in Southern manufacturing and mining enterprises during January and February. The amount is placed at $28,200,000. Kentucky shows the largest aggregate, $6,851,000, while Alabama is second with $5,210,000; Virginia, $3,830,000; Texas, $3,593,000; Georgia, $2,074,000; Maryland, $2,015,000; North Carolina, $1,227,000; West Virginia, $916,000; South Carolina, $904,000; Tennessee, $846,000, and other States little less than $50,000 each. This remarkable increase is made up of wide diversity of industries. Cotton mills now building and inaugurated since January 1 will cost over $3,250,000, and add more than 100,000 spindles to the number now in the South. As showing their faith in Southern cotton manufacturing, a number of well-established Southern mills propose to largely increase their capacity. The Eagle and Phœnix Mill, of Columbus, Ga., intend to erect a new $100,000 mill; the Rome (Ga.) cotton factory will spend $100,000 on a new mill; the Riverside Cotton Mill Company, at Danville, Va., Matthews Mill Company, at Selma, Ala., and the Birmingham (Ala.) cotton mill will expend about $100,000 or more on new mills; while in addition to these there are numerous other cotton factory projects being worked up. An immense amount of Northern and Western capital is going into the Southern industries, and the Southern people are investing in such new enterprises.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MATSON reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 29, 1884.

Prayer by Rev. W. F. SHORT, D. D., of Jacksonville, Ill.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the Hou e of Representatives:

A bill (S. 465) for the relief of Mary L. Walker and Ella Walker;

A bill (S. 652) to carry into effect the decree of the district court of the United States for the southern district of New York in the case of the Spanish ferry-boat Nuestra Señora de Regla; and Joint resolution (S. R. 80) relative to the ceremonies of the unveiling of the statue of Chief-Justice Marshall.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The bill (H. R. 2228) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the bill lie on the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. 578) to authorize the sale of a certain portion of the Fort Hays military reservation, Kansas, to the Ellis County Agricultural Society of Kansas; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 239) to fill vacancies existing in the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HILL. I present a petition of citizens of Colorado residing and doing business in Denver, praying that such clerks be provided in the Comptroller's Office as will expedite the payment of rebate claims due to dealers in tobacco and cigars. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I also present, at the request of my colleague [Mr. BOWEN], who is absent, a similar petition from citizens of Denver, Colo., which I move be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON presented the following petitions, praying Congress to grant to each honorably discharged soldier who served in the late war of the rebellion one hundred and sixty acres of land; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

The petition of Garret Post, No. 16, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of E. C. Little Post, No. 54, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of James Brownell Post, No. 222, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of Tracy Post, No. 52, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of Sheppard Post, No. 157, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of Jewett Post, No. 60, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of Blake Post, No. 114, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

The petition of John J. Stillman Post, No. 194, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic;

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of citizens of Great Barrington, Mass., praying for liberal appropriations for Indian education; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Osage City, Kans., and a petition of citizens of Derby, Kans., praying that justice may be done the Nez Percé Indians now in Indian Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SEWELL presented a petition of survivors of the Veteran Reserve Corps, citizens of Paterson, N. J., and a petition of Aaron Wilkes Post, No. 23, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of New Jersey, praying such legislation as is recommended by the committee on pensions of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GARLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. 2123) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862; also, to amend an act approved July 2, 1864, and also an act approved May 7, 1878, both in amendment of said first-mentioned act, and to provide for a settlement of the claims growing out of the issue of bonds to aid in the construction of certain of said railroads, and to secure to the United States the payment of all indebtedness of certain of the companies therein mentioned;" which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2019) to provide for the establishing of terms of court in the district of Colorado, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., reported it without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. I am also instructed by the Committee on Finance, to which was referred the bill (S. 1958) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., to report it adversely, as that feature is incorporated in the House bill just reported. I move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. I am directed by the Committee on Epidemic Diseases to ask that a statistical table prepared by the secretary of the National Board of Health in respect to the yellow-fever, which the committee regards as containing valuable information, be printed for the use of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. How many copies?

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose the usual number.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be upward of 1,900 copies.

Mr. HARRIS. Five hundred copies will be sufficient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that five hundred copies of the paper he has described be printed for the use of the Committee on Epidemic Diseases. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the petition of Wolff and Brown, asking for compensation for certain horses alleged to have been impressed into the service in Colorado in 1863, have instructed me to report the same back to the Senate adversely, recommending that the prayer of the petition be not granted, that the claim of the claimants therein made be not allowed, and that this report be agreed to.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 328) for the relief of John P. T. Davis, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have accompanied each of these resolutions with a report, and I desire to state that the Committee on Military Affairs does not deem such legislation judicious, and gives notice that hereafter it will report all such cases adversely.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on Finance, reported an amendment intended to be proposed to the bill making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMPTON. The Committee on Military Affairs have instructed me to report formally without amendment the joint resolution (H. Res. 170) in relation to the claim made by Dr. John B. Read against the United States for the alleged use of projectiles claimed as the invention of said Read, and by him alleged to have been used pursuant to a contract or arrangement made between him and the War Department, and for which no compensation has been made. This joint resolution has passed the House. A similar resolution has already been favorably reported upon from the Committee on Military Affairs, and I shall ask to call this up in place of the one on the Calendar when it is reached.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. M. D. Garrett, praying for relief on account of money paid to the sureties of her late husband, W. H. Garrett, late agent of the Creek Indians, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report a joint resolution in relation to the ceremonies to be authorized upon the completion of the Washington Monument. I ask to have it read; it will take but a moment.

The joint resolution (S. R. 82) in relation to ceremonies to be authorized upon the completion of the Washington Monument was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the shaft of the Washington Monument is approaching completion, and it is proper that it should be dedicated with appropriate ceremonies, calculated to perpetuate the fame of the illustrious man who was "first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen:" Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a commission, to consist of five Senators, eight Representatives, three members of the Washington Monument Society, and the United States engineer in charge of the work, be, and the same is hereby, created, with full powers to make arrangements for—

I. The dedication of the monument to the name and memory of George Washington by the President of the United States with appropriate ceremonies.

II. A procession from the monument to the Capitol, escorted by regular and volunteer corps, the Washington Monument Society, representatives of cities, States, and organizations which have contributed blocks of stone, and such bodies of citizens as may desire to appear.

III. An oration in the Hall of the House of Representatives on the 22d day of February, A. D. 1885, by Hon. Robert C. Winthrop, who delivered the oration at the laying of the corner-stone of the monument in 1848, with music by the Marine Band.

IV. Salutes of one hundred guns from the navy-yard, the artillery headquarters, and such men-of-war as can be anchored in the Potomac.

And such sum of money as may be necessary to defray the expenses incurred under the above provisions, not exceeding $2,500, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate of the 26th of February, 1883, to inquire into and report upon the questions relating to the land in Marin County, California, known as Corte de Madera del Presidio, of one square league of land, granted to Juan Read by the Mexican Government, and confirmed by the United States courts to the heirs of said Read, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2124) to authorize a suit to settle the boundaries of the grant known as Rancho Corte de Madera del Presidio, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOAR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (S. 1283) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 5352 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in reference to bigamy, and for other purposes," approved March 22, 1882; which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1307) abolishing the office of assistant surgeon-general of the Army, to report it adversely. I wish to make the statement accompanying this report that the bill we passed the other day relative to the Medical Department supersedes the necessity of the passage of a bill of this kind. Therefore I am instructed to report the bill adversely, and I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 2125) granting a pension to Sarah Jane Prince; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 2126) to allow soldiers or sailors who have lost an arm and leg in the military service of the United States a pension for each disability; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2127) for the relief of Mrs. S. B. Duvall, widow of the late Rev. W. P. Duvall, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2128) granting a pension to James McLaughlin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 2129) to provide for the erection of necessary buildings upon the Government reservation at West Point, N. Y.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2130) granting a pension to Emma De Long; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2131) for the relief of Margaret A. Caswell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PUGH introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 83) authorizing the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to make exchange of tents for Gatling guns with the National Guard of Alabama, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Frank A. Page be withdrawn from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for consideration with the bill (S. 2071) for his relief.

On motion of Mr. PLUMB, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James Eveleth, asking compensation for services "as agent of the Engineer Department of the Army to disburse certain public moneys," be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. CALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in relation to the bill for the relief of William Burley; also the papers in relation to the bill for the relief of M. H. Hart, administrator of William Burley, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate subject to the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 237) for the relief of John E. Wheelock; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 245) authorizing the loan of certain flags to the Portland Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association.

LOAN OF FLAGS.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution just reported from the Committee on Military Affairs this morning relative to the loan of some flags of the Government to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the annual celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence, which was this morning reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears no objection, and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, after the word "flags," to insert the words "or as many as can be conveniently spared;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan to the mayor and aldermen of the city of Charlotte, N. C., two hundred United States flags, or as many as can be conveniently spared, to be used in decorating said city at the approaching celebration of the one hundred and ninth anniversary of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence of May 20, 1775: Provided, That satisfactory security be given for the safe return of said flags, and that the Government be at no expense for transportation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the Virginia resolution be considered.

Mr. VANCE. I ask unanimous consent to consider a similar joint resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs this morning in relation to a loan of flags to the city of Richmond.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL BANKS AT LINCOLN AND NASHVILLE.

Mr. MANDERSON. The Committee on Finance this morning through the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] reported favorably House bill No. 5966, which has for its object a change of the name of a national bank at Lincoln, and the authorization of an increase of the capital stock of a national bank at Nashville. It is important to the parties interested that the bill should be considered at once, and I ask unanimous consent that it be now considered.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to reserve an objection for the moment until the bill is read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length for information.

The bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn., was read, and by unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the Senator who reported the bill state what is the necessity for legislation in regard to the increase of the capital stock of a bank whether that is not authorized by the existing law or by the Comptroller?

Mr. HARRIS. In answer to the question propounded by the Senator from Massachusetts I will state that under the law as it now stands a banking corporation may in its original articles of association provide for an increase of its capital stock from time to time up to the maximum which is fixed in the articles of association; but after that time, if it is desired to increase the capital stock beyond that maximum, the Comptroller of the Currency holds it can only be done by the grant of the authority by Congress. Hence this banking corporation can not increase beyond half a million dollars, that being the maximum fixed in its original articles of association. I hope the answer is satisfactory to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] had made the same explanation to me in private and I thought it ought to go on the record. I have no further objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM PERINE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII.

The bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, was announced as first in order upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was read on a previous occasion.

Mr. PLATT. I think I ought to object to the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and goes over.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to say before making the objection formally, that this is one of a class of claims which have a history, and I do not think the bill ought to be considered under a rule which will not allow the full history of that class of claims to be stated. I do not desire to delay action upon it; but I think it is but right that it shall go over into the other Calendar under Rule IX, and therefore I object to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is objected to, and will be passed over.

Mr. PIKE subsequently said: I desire the consent of the Senate to call attention to Order of Business 260, being the bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, which was called this morning and objected to by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT].

Mr. PLATT. I have stated to the Senator from New Hampshire that I would to accommodate him withdraw my objection to that bill. It went over on my objection this morning.

Mr. PIKE. I desire to have it retain its place on the Calendar and be in order to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). If there be no objection such will be the order.

C. M. WILCOX.

The bill (S. 139) for the relief of C. M. Wilcox was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been read at length on a former occasion.

Mr. MAXEY. The bill now before the Senate was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely, the views of the minority were filed, and the bill was placed on the Calendar at my request. There are some papers which I should like to have before the bill is gone into. In order to prevent any further inconvenience to the Senate I ask that the bill be transferred to the Calendar under Rule IX, and then I can have time to examine the case before its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The consideration of the bill is objected to, and it passes over into the Calendar under Rule IX.

RUDOLPH LESCHOT'S PATENT.

The bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been laid over for the return of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. The first amendment recommended by the Committee on Patents will be read.

Mr. HARRISON. Is there a report in the case?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the question; after which the report will be read. The first amendment recommended by the Committee on Patents will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 1, line 4, before the word "empower," the Committee on Patents report to insert "and," and after the word "empowered" to strike out "and directed" and insert "in his discretion;" so as to read:

That the Commissioner of Patents is hereby duly authorized and empowered, in his discretion, to renew and extend, in the manner hereinafter made and provided, to George Leschot, father and heir at law of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, for a new term of seven years from and after the date of the passage hereof, the letters patent granted and issued to said Rudolph Leschot, deceased, bearing date the 14th day of July, A. D. 1863, for "tool for boring rock," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] asks that the report be read. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLATT February 25, 1884:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 419) for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, having considered the same, make the following report:

A bill of the same character was considered and favorably reported by the Committee on Patents at the second session of the Forty-seventh Congress. The report of last session is adopted by the present committee, and the passage of the bill, with certain amendments proposed by the committee, is recommended.

[Senate Report No. 909, Forty-seventh Congress, second session.]

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, submitted the following report, to accompany bill S. 2311:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred a bill for the extension of letters patent to the heirs of Rudolph Leschot, deceased, for a tool for boring rock, have considered the same, and respectfully report:

The patent which it seeks to extend was granted July 14, 1863, for seventeen years. The invention consists in the combination of a drill-head armed with diamonds, and fitted to the end of a tubular boring bar, whereby a rotative and advancing movement is imparted to the cutting head, a forced flow of water through the said tube and head, whereby the constant rotative and advancing movement of the head cuts away the rock, and the flow of water through the drill-rod and returning outside of it brings with it the cuttings or detritus; and this is irrespective of the mechanism by which the rotative or advance movement of the drill is imparted. By its use, when the drill-head is made annular, the exact nature of the rock, strata, or mineral through which the drill passes can be ascertained. For prospecting and like purposes this feature is of great value in the saving of time and expense over the only known previous methods for accomplishing the same result.

The inventor, a native of Switzerland, was from poverty unable to introduce his invention into public use in any country from his own means, and has realized nothing from it. Those who became interested in it in the United States expended in its development and introduction into use not less than $175,000 over and above their receipts for it from all sources. During the first seven years of the United States patent the public had not purchased one machine, and the proposed extension will be, in fact, only a grant of seventeen years from the date at which the invention commenced to be used in this country. The extension of this patent will give the needy heirs of the inventor a reasonable compensation for the value of his invention to the United States, without causing the payment by the public for its use to exceed a fair consideration for the benefits it will realize from it.

The inventor obtained a patent in France for the same invention, which gave him no remuneration. He died in poverty and his father, George Leschot, who will derive the benefit from this proposed extension, is also poor.

The inventor assigned one-half of his United States patent to Lorenzo Dow, for his assistance and expenses in obtaining and introducing his patent into this country. Dow sold the patent to the Annular Diamond Drill Company, organized in 1864, receiving payment for the whole patent in stock. This company expended about $30,000, with no receipts, and failed. The stock thus proved worthless, and neither Dow nor the inventor received one dollar's benefit from it. About 1868 the patent was sold to Severance & Holt for $25,000, who in three years expended $175,000 more in attempting to bring the invention into successful use. They only received about $7,000 in all in the way of returns for this expenditure. In 1871 the American Diamond Drill Company became the owners of the patent, and in three years they expended $175,000 over the amount paid for the patent, and received only $125,000 in return for all this expense. That company then failed and went into the hands of a receiver. The receiver sold the patent in 1875 to the American Diamond Rock Boring Company. This company has expended about $300,000, and its receipts do not exceed that amount. This company lost money during the first two years of their ownership of the patent in endeavoring to introduce the invention, and it was only during the last three years of the existence of the patent that any profit at all has been derived therefrom, and that has only been sufficient to meet their prior expenses.

The invention within the last few years has worked a complete revolution in the mining interests in this country. By the employment of the hollow Leschot drill a test hole is bored in any direction, vertically, horizontally, or at any angle, leaving a core in the center of the drill or hole which may be at any time removed, and thus permit the examination of the rock, earth, or strata through which the drill has passed, and at a trifling expense compared with the old shaft-sinking method of prospecting, with a great saving also in time. A vein once lost can be easily and inexpensively found by means of this drill. It has thus been of immense value to the mining interests of this country, enabling the miners and those owning mineral properties to prospect and locate with certainty the extent and wealth of their ores and the size and position of their veins; and its use for prospecting and developing mining property has saved this country enormous sums of money which would otherwise have been expended in the older expensive systems of prospecting and development.

Nothing has been received from the invention in European countries for the reason that it has not there been applied to mining interests, there being no mining interests of sufficient consequence to warrant the expense of its introduction.

It is satisfactorily shown, first, that the invention is of great public value; second, that the inventor has received no compensation for it; third, that this failure was without his fault; fourth, that there is a reasonable prospect that the proposed extension would secure him a reasonable compensation; and fifth, that the public has not already paid for this invention and will not be burdened by the extension.

We therefore recommend the passage of a substitute, which is herewith reported, for the original bill.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understand the state of this case from the reading of the report, this patent during its lifetime passed through a number of hands. The inventor originally sold one-half of it to Mr. Dow. Then it seems that some corporation took the patent, issuing to Dow and his co-owner of the patent payment in stock. This company failed, and there was a succession of transfers, some by assignment and others, I judge, by judicial decree, of this patent from one person to another. It seems these successive owners expended large sums of money in developing the invention, and finally have brought it up so that it has got to be a most useful patent, one in general use in mining regions. It is proposed by this bill, as I understand, now to give the father of the original inventor the benefit of a seven-years' extension of this patent.

It seems to me if there is any reason for the extension of this patent the owners of the patent during its lifetime, and who have expended the marvelous sums of money that are mentioned in the report in developing it, are the persons who are entitled, at least in some measure, to the benefits of this extension; yet it is proposed to give to the representative of the original inventor the entire benefit of all their development of this patent, of their expenditure in seeking to introduce it, and to renew the patent itself for seven years to the father of the original inventor.

It does not seem to me that the bill ought to pass. I may be mistaken about it, but from the casual reading of this report it is proposed long after the expiration of the patent, and when it has come into general use, to renew an exclusive control of this valuable implement in connection with mining, and to do it for the benefit of the father of the original inventor, thus giving the inventor not simply compensation for his original labor and thought in the invention, but the benefit of all that has been expended, at a loss by the intermediate owners of the patent.

Mr. PLUMB. I think it is hardly practicable to give this matter the requisite consideration under Rule VIII, and I therefore object.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator withdraw his objection for a single moment, that I may reply to the suggestion that was made by the Senator from Indiana, so that the reply may go along with the suggestion in the RECORD?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly; I withdraw the objection.

Mr. PLATT. It must be apparent to the Senator from Indiana, as to every one else, that if this was a proposition to extend this patent for the benefit of the father of the inventor in opposition to the wishes of the companies that have developed the patent, there would have been opposition on their part. There was no opposition on their part, and they are perfectly willing that the patent should be extended.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether that does not disclose the fact, which I suppose perhaps to be under this, that while this application is made for the poor father of the inventor, it is altogether possible that there is some arrangements by which these owners of the patent are to get the benefit of it?

Mr. PLATT. I presume very likely that there is some arrangement between Leschot, the father, and the present owners of the patent, whereby he will receive a fair compensation and reward for the invention of his son, and the present owners of the patent will go on manufacturing and using the machine. I think that is true in every case where the extension of a patent is asked for.

Mr. CONGER. I should like to ask whether this elderly foreigner has come across here to make any effort for his son's patent. I feel different from the Senator from Indiana about this. This is a bill to benefit a citizen of Switzerland by giving him a renewal of a patent for an invention of his son. In this country there are so many generous people ready to assist anybody abroad in securing rights that I have no doubt somebody in this land knows of this old man and that he is alive and has a right to the patent, and from some humane motive is endeavoring to help him through. I should like to know if gentlemen here know anything at all about this, if he will ever derive any benefit from it, or whether a contract for the benefit of the extension has already been made. I am somewhat familiar with these modes of bringing matters before committees by disinterested persons who want to aid strangers and aliens and foreigners. I served some years on the Patent Committee in the other House. Times may have changed now and people may have come forward to assist this old gentleman out of pure benevolence.

Mr. PLATT. I do not know whether the Senator desires an answer. I have risen two or three times to answer, but he has kept on talking.

Mr. CONGER. I have asked my question.

Mr. PLATT. I presume the Senator from Michigan did not hear the report read. If he had he undoubtedly would not have asked the question which he has asked.

Mr. CONGER. I have read the report just now.

Mr. PLATT. The Senator will see that the committee say this patent is to be extended for the benefit of the father of the inventor.

Mr. CONGER. It says he may receive some benefit from it.

Mr. PLATT. I do not think it is true that the father of the inventor has come personally to this country to prosecute the case, but that it is done with his assent, upon his application, upon his desire, and for his benefit is true.

I do not think that there is any occasion for any criticism growing out of the fact that this bill proposes to extend a patent for the benefit of a foreigner. A native of Switzerland, where they have no patent law or had no patent law at this time, makes an invention and obtains a patent in the United States, and I do not know why, having come here under our laws and obtained a patent, he is not as much entitled or his heirs at law as much entitled as the citizens of this country to an extension.

It has been the policy of our country for many years to make no distinction between a citizen of this country and a citizen of a foreign country in the matter of patents. We invite the citizens of all countries to come here and take out patents. It is deemed to be for our advantage, for the advantage of our country, and I do not think there is anything to be gained by the criticism of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PLUMB. I renew the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GARLAND in the chair). The Senator from Kansas renews his objection to the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. PLUMB. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. MILLER, of California. How long have the owners had the advantage of this patent?

Mr. PLATT. The report states that the patent has been in operation seventeen years. The report states fully the efforts which have been made to introduce it, and so far as I know I can say to the Senators representing the mining regions that there is no opposition on the part of persons who use this machine in mining operations. I think the fact that this application for an extension is pending here is well-known throughout the country. It has been now before two sessions of Congress. I think it is well known among mining men, who prospect with it and who are entirely willing that this patent shall be extended. I certainly have heard no objection from any quarter, and I have heard from many quarters, from those who were engaged in mining operations and understood the matter thoroughly, a wish that it should be extended.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It has been in use on the Comstock to my knowledge for ten years, and in mining operations generally it has been in use ten or eleven years.

Mr. PLATT. No doubt of that.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think the patentees have had the profits of this patent a sufficiently long time.

Mr. HOAR. What profits have they had?

Mr. MILLER, of California. I do not know what profits they have had. I know that nobody could use the diamond drill without purchasing the right.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, one word in reply to my friend from California. The Committee on Patents adopt a rule strict almost to harshness in dealing with these applications. Everybody knows that the patent inventions of the last thirty or forty years are what have created and multiplied the wealth of this country. They are what have made its agricultural lands habitable; they are what have made the growth of our great agricultural States in the Northwest possible. Without them we should be a nation living by the borders of the sea and on the great rivers, and for all the inhabitants of the interior without any means of cheap, easy, substantial communication with the rest of the world. The whole of our civilization has been created, fostered, and increased by the wonderful capacity with which God has blessed the brain of the American people in this generation more than all mankind in all generations that ever existed before.

It so happens that the principle of an invention such as would be protected by a patent is a subtle, delicate affair, and it is easy for persons who desire to rob an inventor of his rights under his patent, by lawsuits, by ingenious devices, by fraud, by legal capacity and skill, to very often make a patent during its life a source of expense and burden to the patentee. The class of men who make inventions are not the great scientific men; they are not men of wealth; they are not the men of education. These disclosures and inspirations come to the workman at his bench, who turns over in his mind the manner of saving the labor which is his day's occupation. That is an invariable rule almost as to the class of men who make these inventions. When a man has made such an invention benefiting the country as this man has by hundreds of thousands and perhaps millions of dollars, it is the policy of our law, as it was the policy of the farmers of our Constitution, that there should be secured to him some reasonable and moderate compensation. The Committee on Patents have adopted this rule, that in order to propose an extension of a patent in the first place it must be shown to have been of great public benefit. It must not have been a trifle. In the next place it must be shown that the inventor, without any fault of his own, has failed to receive any adequate and reasonable remuneration. In the third place it must be shown that the extension is likely to be of some benefit to him in the future; that is, he has made or can make some arrangement with some business man who will furnish the capital, if he has not got it himself, by which he can hope in the future to receive a moderate return. Fourth, it must be shown that there is nothing in the circumstances of the case which would make the extension any burden to the public. Unless these four things appear these claims are rejected.

Without going into the question of the facts in this case, these four things appeared here. The committee carefully and painfully examined the testimony and cross-examined and sifted it with the knowledge that every report they make has to run the gauntlet of hostile criticism and attack from Senators who have not examined the circumstances. I do not think it is quite fair when the committee have patiently examined this question, giving full notice, having it understood that everybody who may have adverse interests shall have a chance to be heard, and then considered it in the light of sworn testimony—I do not think it is quite fair to encounter it by a Senator who does not know anything about it getting up and guessing that after all these patentees must have had a good deal of benefit in the last ten years. If he knows any fact let him state it. We do not want to be misled; but I do not think it is quite fair to be met with sneers or guesses of this kind.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California has spoken once.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I suppose under the rule I can not reply to the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection the Senator will proceed.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I think it is perfectly fair when a bill comes before the Senate to discuss it and to criticise it. It does not make any difference what committee it comes from, it is the practice of the Senate to do that. I merely stated the fact that this invention had been used in the mining regions to my knowledge for about ten years, and I supposed that the patentees had had the benefit of that monopoly.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator also stated that he did not know anything about it.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I stated that I did not know any of the facts on sworn testimony, and I doubt very much whether the committee has had anything more than one side of this case. It is usual in an investigation of subjects of this character that affidavits and other ex parte testimony are adduced to substantiate the claim of a party desiring an extension of a patent. The committees do not get both sides of the case as a rule. I do not say how it has been in this case, but I certainly had the right to raise the question, and the Senator from Massachusetts and other members of the committee had the right to explain as to what evidence they have based their opinion upon.

I do not challenge the truth of the statement of the committee entirely; but I may be permitted to express some doubt that this case has been proven as positively and as clearly as it would have been required to be in a court of justice. That is my position in the matter. I would be the last man to withhold any benefit from an inventor who had invented a great machine or appliance which has done good to mankind. I desire that he should have the benefit of it. In this case I have not seen any evidence except the mere statement of the parties in interest, who seem to be a company who have purchased the patent from the inventor or acquired it in some way. I say I have no evidence but that the parties in interest here have received all the benefit that they were entitled to.

Mr. PLUMB. I renew the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it will go over.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill the Chair is informed is to be passed over for one week from yesterday.

GRANT OF LETTERS PATENT.

Mr. GEORGE submitted the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That the Committee on Patents be instructed to report a bill to prevent hereafter the granting of any patent for any invention or discovery made by any person not at the time of such invention or discovery a citizen and resi dent of the United States, and the committee is further instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that all patents hereafter granted shall be subject to purchase by the United States for the public use, upon a fair valuation thereof.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

IOWA INDIAN TRIBE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1108) to provide for the sale of the Iowa Indian reservation, in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, for the issuance of a patent for a reservation for the Iowa tribe of Indians in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 2, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "$2.50" and insert "$10;" so as to read:

Provided, That no portion of such land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case for less than $10 per acre, and to none except such as purchase the same for actual occupation and settlement.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "ten" and inserting in lieu thereof "five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maryland. The question is on this amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Maryland as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I move to amend section 2, line 4, by striking out "Beatrice" and inserting "Lincoln;" also in section 2, line 14, by striking out "Beatrice" and inserting "Lincoln." The Lincoln land office is very much nearer to the reservation and can be reached by one line of railroad, whereas to reach Beatrice it would be necessary to resort to more than one line.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What committee reports the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANDERSON. I wish to suggest to my colleague that I understand these lands are situated in the land district of Beatrice. It is proposed by his amendment to have them sold at the land office at Lincoln, which is in another land district. I think myself that Lincoln is the far preferable place on account of the convenience of its being reached by railway; but it may be that some difficulty may arise on account of the land being located in another land district. I suggest that this be the amendment: instead of striking out the word "Beatrice" add the words "or Lincoln, as the Secretary of the Interior may direct." I make that suggestion to my colleague. Perhaps that will reach the purpose he has in view.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I do not know that there is any objection to that, but I do not think the fact of the reservation being in one land district or another has anything to do with the land being sold at either land office. I have no objection to the modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK] accepts the suggestion of his colleague [Mr. MANDERSON]. The amendment will be modified so as to insert in section 2, line 4, after "Beatrice," "or at Lincoln," and after "Nebraska" to insert "as the Secretary of the Interior may direct."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The same amendment will be incorporated in line 14 of section 2. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MORGAN. I observe that in this bill the committee have departed from the rule they have heretofore adopted, at least within a few years, of requiring the consent of the adult male Indians before their lands can be disposed of. This bill, as I understand it, requires the consent of the council of the Indians. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee what is the reason for departing from the rule which obtained in the Ute reservation, and in the Sioux reservation, and various other reservations that have been sold by act of Congress?

Mr. DAWES. There are various treaties with the Indians that require the assent of the Indians to parting with their territory in different ways. As to the Sioux reservation to which the Senator refers, it is required by the treaty that three-fourths of the male adults shall assent in writing. Other treaties require two-thirds of the male adults. There is no treaty requisition with respect to the manner of parting with this land, as I understand, although I did not report this bill. I remember that the Secretary of the Interior criticised the method of requiring the assent of the Indians generally. His view is that when the chiefs and headmen have given their assent everybody else has given his assent. But the ordinary way, where there is no treaty stipulation to the contrary, is that they give their consent in an open council, a democratic way of getting together and expressing their consent in open council. It is subject to great abuses; they may be practiced upon; and so they may under any rule that may be adopted and followed. It all depends upon the fidelity of the execution of the law.

In this case we are told that all the Indians are anxious for the passage of this bill, and that this bill comes from them for the purpose of realizing the results. The reason that the male adults' assent individually is not required is because there is no treaty stipulation to that effect.

Mr. MORGAN. I intended to ask the chairman of the committee another question about these Indians. Where is the main body of this tribe residing now?

Mr. DAWES. The main body of the tribe have gone temporarily into the Indian Territory, and are located down there upon a reservation set apart for them out of that portion of the Indian Territory that the United States purchased of the Cherokees. A few of them preferred to remain on the old reservation in Kansas, and they have remained there till some of them have taken up land in severalty upon this reservation, and some of them have gone one by one down to the Territory and joined their associates there. This body of land lies there, Indian land, unoccupied and unimproved and untaxed, and they desire to realize the cash value of this land. The Kansas people of course are desirous of opening it up to settlement. It has risen in value from the Government price to from eight to twelve dollars an acre. It is a valuable body of land, and if properly administered the fund will be of great benefit to these Indians.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill, as I understand, permits any Indian who wishes to hold land in severalty in the present reservation to do so.

Mr. DAWES. Yes; every individual has his own individual free choice either to go down into the Indian Territory or to remain where he is and take land in severalty. This will cease to be a reservation. It will be held hereafter either by individual Indians like white men or by white men themselves.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 1017) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. WILSON. The Postmaster-General greatly desires to have this bill acted on at an early day, and such is my desire; but the report of the committee is antagonized by a minority report, in which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] takes no little interest. He has been called away from the city and will be absent possibly until next Monday. I therefore suggest that the bill be allowed to retain its place on the Calendar and go over until the return of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MAXEY. In addition to what is stated by the Senator from Iowa, as one of the minority I hope the suggestion will be agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

INDIANS ON UMATILLA RESERVATION.

The bill (S. 66) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, in section 2, line 38, after the word "another," to insert:

And if any conveyance is made of the lands set apart and allotted as herein provided, or any contract made touching the same, or any lien thereon created before the issuing of the patent herein provided, such conveyance, contract, or lien shall be absolutely null and void.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee, or the Senator in charge of the bill, why the words "agricultural land" are used there in designating the lands that may be set apart in severalty to the Indians? Of course I am not acquainted with that section of the world; I do not know but that there may be valuable mineral land there. I desired to ask the chairman of the committee whether there was any particular reason for inserting the words "agricultural land" wherever they occur in the bill to designate the class of lands that might be set apart for the Indians.

Mr. SLATER. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain. These Indians are beginning to follow some agricultural pursuits, and the object is to give them a fair opportunity for agriculture by putting them in possession of the good agricultural land on the reservation. The word "agricultural" is used to secure that end, so that they may have good land and have an equal race with the white man.

Mr. MORGAN. Are there any valuable mineral lands there?

Mr. SLATER. None.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of this bill why it is that the bill provides for the segregation of these allotted lands in one body, and why it is not allowed to each Indian to go anywhere upon this reservation and make his allotment.

Mr. SLATER. These Indians desire to retain their organization as a separate body of Indians. They do not wish to be scattered and mixed indiscriminately among the whites. They desire to remain in a compact body. It would operate very disadvantageously both to the Indians and to the whites, and lead to constant trouble if they were scattered about. The purpose of the bill is to protect all who desire land in severalty and to ascertain the quantity necessary for that purpose, not exceeding 120,000 acres. It is very proper and very important that they should be kept in a body and maintain their tribal organization. That can not be done if they are allowed to be scattered and the land to be sold indiscriminately. There will be constant confusion about fencing and about stock and things of that kind, if that is allowed.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not see why we should make the limitation 120,000 acres. Suppose it should turn out that it would require more than 120,000 acres to supply them with good agricultural lands and comply with the specific provisions of this bill. It seems to me that we ought to allow these Indians to take whatever number of acres will be necessary to comply with the specific provisions of the bill granting one hundred and sixty acres and forty acres, &c. I do not see the necessity for that limitation.

Mr. SLATER. The Senator would have observed by looking at the provisions of the bill that in addition to agricultural lands allotted there is to be another body of timber and pasture land held in common. It will take about 70,000 acres, after satisfying the allotment, to give them pasture lands which they need, and timber land in addition. If the provisions referred to were not in the bill the commission that goes out there would be compelled to report the fact that there are more lands than can be allotted within the reservation provided; and that would delay proceedings until further action.

Mr. ALLISON. I did observe the provision the Senator alludes to, namely, that in addition to the specific allotments there shall be a general allotment for pasturage, &c., but the whole allotment will be 120,000 acres, as I understand. In other words, this bill is a mere method of dividing up the reservation, as I understand.

Mr. SLATER. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. So as to limit it to 120,000 acres instead of 288,000, as it is now, or whatever it is. I suggest to the Senator that the interest upon this fund should be 5 per cent.

Mr. SLATER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the law in reference to every other Indian tribe in the United States, and I do not think we should make an exception in this case.

Mr. SLATER. I will make no objection to an amendment of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to amend the bill by inserting "five" instead of "four" per cent.

The SECRETARY. In section 3, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "five."

Mr. DAWES. I understood it was "five" in the original bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Is the Secretary reading from the words in italics?

Mr. DAWES. The bill had the careful examination of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. SLATER. I supposed it was "five."

Mr. ALLISON. The Secretary read "four."

Mr. DAWES. I supposed it was "five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa moves to strike out "four" and and insert "five"—in what line?

Mr. ALLISON. Wherever "four" now is I move to insert "five." The Secretary read "four." I do not remember the line. I suppose it would be in section 4.

Mr. DAWES. There may be a misprint.

Mr. ALLISON. I have before me the substitute for Senate bill 1108, all printed in italics. The fourth section of the substitute is on page 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary informs the Chair that the Senator from Iowa has the wrong bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very sorry for that.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the place where the amendment is desired is in line 10 of section 3.

Mr. SLATER. That is the point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 10, section 3, after the word "draw," it is proposed to strike out "four" and insert "five."

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question, and declared that the ayes had it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I raise the point of order that nobody voted for the amendment and one voted against it; and how can the Chair announce that the amendment is carried?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let there be an explanation.

Mr. ALLISON. I stated a moment ago that every other Indian tribe in the United States received 5 per cent. upon their funds in the Treasury.

Mr. COCKRELL. Under their old treaties, when money was worth more than it is now.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. This was made a general law in 1880. I can not refer to the law, but it is a statute. Every dollar of Indian trust funds now held in the Treasury pays to the several tribes 5 per cent. If that is wrong, let us change that law; but it seems to me until we do so this fund should draw the same rate of interest. I should say that the best amendment would be to say that the fund shall draw such rate of interest as the law provides. Then if we change the law hereafter to 4 per cent. these people will be placed on the same footing with other Indians.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no treaty stipulation with these Indians, as I understand, to pay them any specific rate of interest. This is a new matter entirely. If you put in 5 per cent. interest here we shall have to pay it for all time to come. With a good many tribes the claim is that there was a treaty stipulation made from 1820 to 1840 that we should pay 5 per cent. The Government was paying then 5 and 6 per cent. interest, and now we are paying but 3 per cent. and can get plenty of money at that. Why we should pay the Indians 5 per cent. I can not understand. There is no justice in it, no equity in it, and no propriety in it.

Mr. ALLISON. I will modify my amendment so as to say "draw interest as now provided by law for Indian trust funds."

Mr. COCKRELL. "As may be provided by law." I do not want this to be a contract, so that hereafter if we should want to reduce this interest they may come in and say, "We have a contract that you can not violate." Leave it subject to the general law.

Mr. DAWES. There must be some law, or it will not draw any interest.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Iowa says we passed a general law in 1880 providing for 5 per cent. interest. Let it go under the general law.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that it seems to me he can obviate the objection of the Senator from Missouri by saying "as now or may hereafter be provided by law."

Mr. DOLPH. It seems to me that there is a little misunderstanding about the condition of the law at the present time. The general bill which was passed by the Senate providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians upon Indian reservations contained a provision, an amendment offered by myself, that in the purchase of the lands of the reservation not used for the purpose of allottment to the Indians the principal should not be paid to the Indians, without express authority of Congress, for twenty-five years, and that in the mean time the purchase-price should be placed in the Treasury of the United States and should bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. I do not understand that that bill has passed the House of Representatives. It may not become a law; but if it does become a law——

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him now?

Mr. DOLPH. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I had no reference to that bill. That is the law without reference to the allotment bill. It is a law which has been on our statute-book for three or four years.

Mr. DOLPH. I am sorry to refer to that bill for another purpose. If that bill becomes a law, then in the purchase of lands of other Indian tribes, that is, the purchase of those portions of Indian reservations not required for the purpose of making the allotments to the Indians on the reservation, the purchase-price will be paid into the Treasury and the Indian tribe will receive 5 per cent. It seems to me it is very proper that these tribes upon the Umatilla reservation should receive the same interest. It does not seem to me to be a very important matter in making appropriations annually for the support of the Indians whether we pay them 4 or 5 per cent., as the principal can be paid to the Indians at any time by consent of Congress for their benefit and then the interest will stop.

I think it a very proper amendment to make the interest 5 per cent. instead of 4 per cent. so as to place these tribes on an equality with other tribes to whom reservations may be alloted under the general provision of the bill to which I have alluded.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I understand that this bill provides that this contract is not to be valid until it is signed by two-thirds or three-fourths of the adult male Indians of this tribe.

Mr. SLATER. A majority.

Mr. MORGAN. It is fair, therefore, that they should be notified in disposing of their lands by contract with the Government of the United States, and if they are not willing to take 4 per cent. they can insist on 5. I hope they will, because we are giving it to the other tribes without any sort of discrimination that I have heard of as yet, and I hope that these tribes when they come to make their contract with the Government of the United States will be fully informed that it is their own land they are dealing with. They are dealing with it and we are dealing with it in the sense of their being the proprietors and having a right to convey, and that therefore they will insist that they will hold on to their title and their land until they get 5 per cent. if they want it.

Mr. DAWES. I will read the existing law in reference to trust funds. I read section 3659 of the Revised Statutes:

All funds held in trust by the United States and the annual interest accruing thereon, when not otherwise required by treaty, shall be invested in stocks of the United States, bearing a rate of interest not less than 5 per cent. per annum.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the date of that law

Mr. ALLISON. That law has been modified. It was invested in 5 per cent. funds.

Mr. DAWES. That is the law in the Revised Statutes. The margin shows that this was revised from a statute of 1841. I know there was a general law provided—I think the Senator from Iowa drafted the law—when all the funds that were in the Interior Department were transferred to the Treasury Department and put upon the books of the Treasury Department to the credit of Indians bearing a rate of interest at 5 per cent. They cease to be invested now in United States stocks, but have gone into the Treasury and stand upon the books of the Treasury to the credit of the Indians. I understand that to be the way the accounts are kept; and for several years since I have known anything about the matter it has always been provided when a new fund has been created that it should bear 5 per cent. interest. I supposed it was necessary to express the rate of interest, but the Senator from Iowa thinks the general law will cover it. I am not certain about that, because I do not put my eye on the law to which the Senator alludes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, being House bill No. 3967.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES AMONG DOMESTIC ANIMALS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 3967) for the establishment of a bureau of animal industry, to prevent the exportation of diseased cattle, and to provide means for the suppression and extirpation of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases among domestic animals.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to offer an amendment at the end of the second section. I move to add:

When such duties take them from their home or ordinary place of business as such agents.

Mr. PLUMB. Why not make that more definite and say "when absent from their usual place of residence?"

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

When such duties take them from their home or ordinary place of business as such agents.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I will modify that at the suggestion of the Senator from Kansas so as to read:

When absent from their usual place of business as such agents.

Mr. PLUMB. "Place of business or residence."

Mr. VAN WYCK. When absent from their usual place of business or residence, as such agents.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 it is proposed to add:

When absent from their usual place of business or residence, as such agents.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WYCK. With a view of some explanation as the meaning of one or two sections, I propose an amendment in section 7, line 9, to strike out the words "within such infected district." Section 6 states "that no railroad company within the United States" shall do certain things. That extends to a railroad anywhere within the United States, and in that section no penalty is attached. The penalty is provided in section 7, and the phraseology there is:

That it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to notify, in writing, the proper officials or agents of any railroad, steamboat, or other transportation company doing business in or through any infected locality, and by publication in such newspapers as he may select, of the existence of said contagion; and any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock within such infected district, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 6 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

The point is here, that while section 6 intends to make it a misdemeanor for any railroad company in the United States to do this, yet the section which provides a penalty restricts it so that the penalty shall be imposed only upon railroads within an infected district. Now, for instance, take the State of Texas: if by any peradventure the Commissioner should designate that as an infected district, all that would be necessary would be to drive the cattle across the State line, and when they were in the Indian Territory or in Kansas they could be taken by any railroad with impunity. They could be placed in charge of a railroad without fear of penalty even if the fact were known that the cattle were diseased, and if the railroad company knew of that fact.

Suppose that in the State of Pennsylvania there existed this lung-disease or pleuro-pneumonia and the Commissioner should declare that State an infected district, the railroads in that State notified of that fact would be subject to a penalty for the transportation of any cattle of this kind; but all that would be necessary under this proposed act for the parties would be to drive their cattle across the State line into New Jersey, and then, although the New York or Pennsylvania Railroad knew the fact that these cattle were infected with the disease, it could carry them to market with impunity.

All that I desire to know, and that we all should know, is just what is intended to be meant by this clause. We have been taught to believe that one object of the bill was to prevent the transportation of stock that had the disease into sections that were free from it. We have been alarmed in the West, and we have been alarmed more than the facts justify, at the fear of the bringing of this infectious disease into our midst. We have been told of the great danger if the disease should get into the herds of the West. It is true there is danger. We have been told that this measure is necessary to prevent that, and yet it furnishes no protection. After all that has been said about pleuro-pneumonia, if it exists at all, and there seems to be very grave doubt about that, it is confined to small localities, and if you would give the Commissioner of Agriculture power to compel better ventilation for your cattle and better feed than the refuse of distilleries we should probably hear very much less of lung-disease or pleuro-pneumonia. But we have been invited to favor this bill because it is to prevent the carrying of diseased cattle from one section to another.

It has been said that the disease does not exist west of the Alleghany Mountains, and that the danger is that by carrying cattle, old or young, to the West, first into the Chicago market and then farther west, the disease may be carried. Yet this very section in language guarantees that that can be done. I suppose this has been innocently incorporated into the bill. We are told that the bill was drawn by persons outside who felt a great zeal and interest in this matter, and the danger is that their zeal or interest has outgrown their caution, because none has been exercised in the drawing of the bill. I think that will be readily conceded.

I desire that the bill shall accomplish something when it is passed. I am constrained to vote for it. I say "constrained," because my judgment has been, and is now, that this is a specious feature of legislation; and yet the alarm has been spread in the public mind and prevails to a very great extent. The people whom I have the honor to represent on this floor feel that alarm, and therefore it is that I am constrained to defer my judgment to theirs and to vote for this measure.

At the same time I desire to have it put into such a shape that it will mean something after it has been passed and becomes a law. So I move to strike out the words "within such infected district," in order to reach any railroad company that transports cattle contrary to the provisions of section 6. As the bill stands now, either purposely or innocently, it puts no penalty except upon a railroad company within an infected district, and, as I said, if New Jersey is declared an infected district, there is no penalty to a railroad company running through New York, Pennsylvania, Indiana, or Ohio, which may load up a car-load of cattle that may be driven across the State line of New Jersey into Pennsylvania or New York and transported to the West. There is no power in this bill to prevent that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, line 9, after the word "stock," it is proposed to strike out the words "within such infected district;" so as to read:

And any person or persons operating any such railroad, or master or owner of any boat or vessel, or owner or custodian of or person having control over such cattle or other live-stock, who shall knowingly violate the provisions of section 6 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. PLUMB. I do not think there is any necessity to be alarmed about that provision. The Senator from Nebraska has disclosed that he is not particularly anxious about perfecting the bill.

Mr. VAN WYCK. My first object is to perfect it.

Mr. PLUMB. I think on the whole it will be seen by reading the entire section and also in connection with section 6 that there is a very proper limitation upon the liability of the owner or custodian of the vessel or boat or railroad having control over the cattle, and that that limitation should be to such control within the infected district, because only by reason of the connection of these means of transportation with the infected district could they be charged with that knowledge in any serious way which would entitle them to be properly prosecuted for a violation of the provisions of this law.

The bill might be made a great deal stronger in many different ways, but the Senator from Nebraska must remember that this is tentative legislation largely. It will not accomplish, probably, all that he or I would desire that it should accomplish as an ultimate thing, but it is the first step, and it was not designed to make it so stringent that it should be hard of enforcement or make too great a change in the condition of things now existing. At some subsequent session of Congress it may be necessary to make some changes. I think it is quite likely that as a result of the investigations the bill provides for we may hereafter be able to legislate much more intelligently than we can now. The bill provides for the investigations necessary to determine what legislation we shall need, and enters upon the question of the transportation of cattle in rather a mild way, with the design of preventing only some of the more obvious results to follow from the transportation of diseased cattle, and is not designed to represent the ultimate judgment of Congress upon this very important question.

While I sympathize very largely with the disposition of the Senator from Nebraska to make this measure still more stringent, at the same time I ask him if it is not better to leave it as it is than to enter upon anything which may be of doubtful policy?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I imagined that the bill was designed to accomplish something when it had passed, and that one purpose in view was to quiet the dread, the apprehension, in the public mind by giving some assurance that at least there should be a check upon the transportation of cattle supposed to be diseased. If the Texas fever should become so alarming as to make it dangerous to transport cattle across into the State of Kansas and place them in the Western herds, I ask my friend if it is not a mockery to the people of that section to say that if Texas should be declared an infected district Texas cattle-owners may drive their cattle across the line, as they would have a right to do, into the Indian Territory or Kansas, and ship them on the cars with impunity and take car-loads after car-loads to other States? Why encumber this measure with sections that mean nothing? There is no protection.

I ask my friend if the Commissioner of Agriculture should declare New Jersey an infected district, is there anything in this proposed act which makes it a penalty for the railroads in New York and Pennsylvania to transport train loads of cattle brought from New Jersey, even if they may have the disease upon them? Is there anything in the bill which imposes any penalty upon them for transporting those cattle from the State line of New Jersey into Chicago, and so on further west?

The bill should mean something or nothing. It starts out in the sixth section with a provision that no railroad company in the United States shall do this thing, and yet when the penalty is annexed it is restricted only to railroads in the infected district.

Mr. COKE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. COKE. I understood the Senator to say it would not be contrary to this proposed act to drive diseased cattle from Texas into the Indian Territory or into Kansas and then ship them by rail.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will look at the latter part of section 6 he will see that it forbids driving diseased cattle from one State or Territory into another.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Precisely, and that is the point I make. That provision is idle and a mockery, for there is no penalty attached to it. The bill attaches a penalty only where it will be of no use, and in the broad domain over which cattle may be transported there is no penalty annexed. Whether it is right to annex a penalty I am not prepared to say; but I want these sections not to be conflicting, and at least that we here shall not be led astray.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I notice in section 4 what I consider to be rather a dangerous power to lodge in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other single officer of the United States Government. I will read the whole of section 4. It provides:

> That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease along the dividing line between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury—

All that business belongs to the Commissioner of Agriculture down to that point—> who shall from time to time establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigation may require.

We listened the other day to a very elaborate and very able argument from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] upon the question chiefly of transportation between the different States and Territories of the Union and our power to control it. I have not as yet heard any person who insisted upon the exercise of this power by the Federal Government who was willing to intrust it entirely to the discretion of a single officer of the Government without law.

This bill enables the Secretary of the Treasury to "establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations" of the Commissioner of Agriculture "may require." It does seem to me that to put it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the whole subject of the transportation of live-stock by rail or by river or on foot is giving to him a very unnecessary power, a very unguarded power, one that is liable of course to abuse, and one in which we take no pains at all to express our view of what ought to be the regulations of this subject of transportation.

In line 11 of section 4, I move to strike out the words "and transportation" after the word "exportation;" so as to read:

> Such regulations concerning the exportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require.

So that the regulations which the Secretary of the Treasury may be authorized to make shall relate to the exportation of live-stock and not to their transportation within the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. PLUMB. It seems to have been all the way through this debate the fear of the opponents of the bill that some officer of the Government of high degree and charged with responsibility under the bill would so exercise his authority as to defeat the object of the bill. The Secretary of the Treasury in the exercise of this authority is no greater a person, nor does he have any greater authority than he exercises every day in regard to matters which relate to the personal property and rights of the citizens of the country. Necessarily the power to be exercised must be great, and it must be exercised under the sense of official responsibility of the person who exercises it. More than all that, the power must be in its very nature summary. It can not be otherwise.

I think, on the whole, if the Senator from Alabama would withdraw from his consideration the bill before the Senate and observe the bill which came from the committee of which he is an honored and an efficient member, and which as I understood him to say yesterday had received his sanction, he will find that that bill commits to the President and to the Secretary of the Treasury, both of them by name, a power much greater and more liable, if there was any liability at all, to be dangerously exercised than any power committed in the bill which is now being considered.

It can not be, I think, even imagined that any Secretary of the Treasury would place restrictions upon the transportation of live-stock which were not in a wise judgment necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes named in the law which gave him the power. It will not do to say you may transport diseased stock to a port of entry for exportation and arrest them there, leaving all the power to be exercised at the port of exportation and none of it to be exercised prior to their arrival there. In the first place, there would be no wisdom in that. Where would be the wisdom in saying that the Secretary of the Treasury might prevent the exportation of cattle which had arrived at New York because they were diseased, and yet not under any circumstances prevent their going to that port by reason of the existence of the same disease in the same herds of cattle? The difference would be simply as to where the power should be exercised. The wise way of exercising the power would be to prevent the diseased cattle from going to that port. Why accumulate at any port, in New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, or elsewhere, a large number of cattle which it is known when they get there can not be exported by reason of the fact that they are diseased? It seems to me that this is sticking in the bark.

As I said, if the Senator will look at the bill which came from the committee of which he is a member he will see that the question of the importation and exportation of cattle, of the slaughtering of cattle, of the paying for cattle slaughtered, of an embargo upon the importation of all live animals and of the exportation of all articles of food, is placed entirely in the power of the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury to determine in every single case, summarily and without any hearing whatever, just exactly what shall be done.

I am not discussing the constitutional feature of this question, because I know the Senator from Alabama would come back at me and say one was a regulation of the external commerce of the country and the other was a regulation of the internal commerce of the country, and one was held to be constitutional and the other might not be constitutional; but I am speaking now of the reasonableness of the power, of the wisdom of depositing it anywhere. It is a power granted all through our statutes in many particulars. If my recollection serves me aright, there is now given substantially this same power, or rather, I will say, the statutes being a little blind, the Secretary of the Treasury has already exercised power of this kind, not with as much freedom perhaps as he would otherwise have done, but it was intended to be conveyed, and substantially has been conveyed, according to the interpretation of the Treasury Department, by statutes already enacted. So I think it will be found that this is not entering upon any new ground whatever.

Mr. MORGAN. The Senator from Kansas has a bill here which I think he has not studied, for he is usually very accurate and expresses himself clearly and well in every particular. The part of section 4 to which I have invited attention does not relate to diseased live-stock alone; it relates as well to diseased as to sound and healthy live-stock. The power is given here to regulate the transportation of live-stock. That means all manner of live-stock, cattle, horses, sheep, goats, poultry, or any description of animals that may be used for food or for purposes of burden. It might include elephants and camels, so far as I know. It seems to include anything and everything. We at one sweep give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to regulate within the United States the transportation of live-stock.

The faith of the Senator from Kansas is very great. I regret that I have not that sort of faith which makes everything whole that I bring forward and makes it unimpeachable, merely because I have the honor of asserting it, sustaining it, and supporting it. The Senator from Kansas seems to have an abiding and boundless faith in the good intentions of every officer of the Government whom he may wish to intrust with discretionary power. I can not go with him to that extent, especially when the Constitution says that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce between the States and with the Indian tribes and foreign countries. It does not say that Congress shall delegate that power to somebody else, but that Congress must exercise the power of regulation. When we get done with the subject there must be something upon the statute-book which a man can take hold of and understand what the law is; otherwise Congress has not performed its duty. Congress can not perform its duty by merely abdicating a discretionary power into the hands of any of the officers of this Government.

I assert as my opinion that there never was a broader or more drastic violation of the constitutional authority of the Senate than is proposed in this single phrase giving to the Secretary of the Treasury the unlimited and unrestricted right of regulating the transportation of live-stock, having no reference as to whether it is diseased or whether it is sound, or to the description of it, whether to be used for human food or for the purposes of burden or draught. It makes no difference; whatever comes within the category of live-stock in the broadest definition that can be given to the term, the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to control and to regulate the transportation of. He may put regulations upon certain railway companies and certain boats which would prohibit those companies entirely from being able to comply with his terms and conditions, and therefore they would lose the whole trade.

I do not pretend to argue before the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury, whether he is the one now in office or the one who may succeed him, or any of his successors, would willfully and wrongfully betray the people of the United States by making unjust and discriminative regulations for certain sections or against certain sections; but, sir, my duty is not performed to my constituents, at least, if I omit to put upon him checks and guards in reference to his power of regulating transportation, which shall compel him to act reasonably and justly, as well as wisely in matters of this kind. I have no right to intrust him with a discretionary power to do as he pleases over a subject of such great magnitude as this is. There are millions and hundreds of millions of dollars involved annually in the transportation of live-stock through this country. What Senator would offer in the Senate a bill, "Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall establish regulations from time to time concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock," and stop it right there? Put that in the form of a bill by itself, and let the Senate come to vote upon it. Can the Senate be asked to pass a bill in that form, thus giving up its power and its duty prescribed to it expressly by the Constitution of making the regulations itself, giving it up into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer? No, sir; we can not pass a bill of that kind and discharge our duty to the country under the Constitution. Such a bill as that might well be ruled out of order in this body as one presenting a clean and clear violation of the duty of Congress.

The Senator from Kansas refers to an amendment coming from the Senator from California, which has not yet been offered but which the Senator from California had printed for the information of the body, which relates to the exportation and importation of cattle from abroad. The Senator from Kansas said that he was not at present disposed to enter upon a discussion of the question of the constitutional power of this Government to regulate the importation and exportation of cattle as contrasted with a similar power to regulate its transportation within the United States. It is not necessary for me to discuss a question of that kind until it comes up; but I will venture to suggest that after all there is a marked distinction in the exercise of these two powers, for the Government of the United States as a nation, and I use that word with a full understanding of its meaning, in its relations with foreign countries, foreign powers, has always had all the powers that belong to a great nation, or any nation, except so far as they are prohibited in the Constitution; whereas the Government of the United States in reference to the powers which it may exercise over and within the States, and over the people within the limits of the United States, is expressly restrained to the exercise of those powers granted, or such as may be incidentally necessary to carry into effect those granted powers. This is horn-book learning among men who have studied the Constitution of the United States, although there is still great room for disputation, as it appears on every occasion when these subjects arise.

I should dishonor the Government of the United States, in my judgment, as a Senator on this floor, if I were to deny to it the right to exercise every power in respect of our foreign relations and our foreign commerce that is not prohibited to it by the Constitution of the United States. There is the treaty-making power. That is a sovereign power, belonging to the crown, we will say, of Great Britain, the country from which we derived our system of government. There the treaty-making power belongs exclusively to the crown, and needs no ratification by any legislative department of the government. In our Constitution we have so modified and restricted that power as that the President can not make a treaty except by the advice and consent of the Senate. There is one of the instances in which there is an express limitation upon the powers of the Government as a nation constituted with reference to its relations to foreign powers and governments; but upon the subject of our right to control importation and exportation as it affects what we may send abroad and as it affects what we may receive from abroad, the proper doctrine of construction is that the Federal Government possesses upon those subjects all powers that are not prohibited to it by the Constitution. It is just the reverse, in my opinion at least, in respect of the powers of the Federal Government within the States, according to what I conceive to be a just rule of interpretation.

But, sir, I maintain that the Congress of the United States could not do a rasher thing or a more inconsiderate thing than to intrust into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the language of this bill, the right to regulate the transportation of live-stock through any part of this country, and that, too, without reference to its being diseased or not diseased. If we can give him that power, we may confer upon him the power to regulate all the internal commerce of the country; and we have nothing to do in order to get rid of this vexed and troublesome question except to enact a general law that hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury may make all rules and regulations that he may consider needful to regulate the transportation of internal commerce between the States or within the States of the American Union.

Now, it is not necessary to this bill that the Commissioner of Agriculture or the Secretary of the Treasury should have this power. It is entirely a gratuitous thing, and doubtless was put into the bill for the want of sufficient caution in the wording of it, but there it is. I can not understand why the committee should desire to hold this power in the bill and confer it upon the Secretary of the Treasury. Most of all, I can not understand why it is that the bill, after having received due consideration elsewhere, should have come to us with this odious outrage upon the constitution of this body, for that is the only way it can be properly characterized in my judgment. This is not a perfect bill by a great deal. The Senate have been engaged several days in trying to perfect it, and in almost every instance the committee have yielded to the judgment of the Senate upon the perfection of the bill.

While I am up I will call the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to another matter, which ought to inform him that the bill needs purging, that it needs trimming out. In the very first section, and following along through all the different sections of the bill, is very loose language—to "report upon the number, value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States, their protection and use." Now, what are the domestic animals of the United States? They are those that are not feræ naturæ. They are those that have been subjected to the use of man, and they include everything from a canary bird up to an elephant. They include cats, dogs, horses, mules, asses, cattle, sheep, goats, swine—all the domestic animals. The whole broad category of animal life that has been reduced to domestic use by the human family in the United States is included in the first section of the bill, and it is made the duty of the Commissioner of Agriculture to institute a universal examination into their condition and, as the bill stood originally, into their number and their value.

The committee have not considered this bill with that sort of critical accuracy that a law of its importance deserves. I dare say it was in consequence of that very fact, because perhaps of a very great pressure for legislation upon this subject, that the committee have brought in a bill here which in one place and another, including the one which is presented in the amendment that I now propose to it, brings forward questions of the gravest possible character and compels us to vote "yea" or "nay" upon them in a bill to which they have really no just or proper relevancy.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, guided by the remarks just made by the Senator from Alabama, I must say that if he understands the fourth section of the bill I do not. He treats it as one conferring an unlimited discretionary power on the Secretary of the Treasury. It does not seem to me that that is its character. I will read that section. It provides—

> That in order to promote the exportation of live-stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live-stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require.

It does seem to me that the latter words in that section place a definite limitation upon the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. He is not to have a general discretion which can deal with all of the elements of the transportation of live-stock throughout the United States, but only a discretion extending to the establishment of such regulations as may be necessary to protect our foreign commerce from the injuries likely to arise from the causes discovered by the Commissioner of Agriculture in the investigations which he pursues under the first part of the section. The results of those investigations are to be laid before the Secretary of the Treasury with such recommendations as the Commissioner of Agriculture may choose to make, and for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of our commerce through the lines of transportation the Secretary of the Treasury may establish such regulations as may be requisite thereto; and that is all the power he is to have. It seems to me that it is necessary to have some discretion lodged somewhere, in order that the lines of this bill, if it shall become a law, may be made effective.

The inland transportation to the seaboard of cattle intended for exportation abroad is quite as important to our foreign commerce as the transportation of cattle upon the ocean; it is a part of the body of the commerce; and in order to meet the opposition now being manifested by foreign governments against the export of cattle from this country to their countries we are attempting to provide such regulations as will assure healthy cattle for exportation and give reasonable grounds for belief on the part of the countries abroad that they will be receiving through our commerce, under the regulations thus established, nothing but healthy cattle. That will maintain our commerce. That will advance the cattle interests of this country. That will afford a swelling volume of this element of our foreign commerce, instead of the diminishing one which is now going on; and to this purpose and on account of the reasons furnished by the investigations to be pursued by the Commissioner of Agriculture, the Secretary of the Treasury is to act in the formulation of these regulations, and for no other purpose nor on any other account.

It does seem to me that the general criticism based on that feature of the section by the Senator from Alabama is a mistaken one, and that the power to establish regulations in connection with transportation is absolutely necessary to give effect to whatever may come from the investigations to be pursued by the Commissioner of Agriculture.

Mr. MORGAN. I have the greatest possible respect for the opinions of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. He is careful and considerate in all he says; but I must express my surprise at the wide difference of opinion between that Senator and myself as to the meaning of this language and its effect, and also as to the power which he contends for on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury or any person whom we may authorize to make regulations for the transportation of commerce.

The Senator says that when the commerce arrives at the port of exportation and forms a body of traffic which we can send abroad it is the right and duty of the United States Government to see that it arrives there in such form as that it will make a proper subject of commerce and be in such a condition as that it ought to be exported. I will take, to illustrate my views of it, the question of the exportation of cotton in my part of the country. It sometimes happens that cotton sent around from New Orleans to New York becomes a little damaged by salt water, by absorption of too much moisture, particularly in times of storm. It goes there, and there the commerce of the country is deteriorated in value because of this damage. It sometimes happens also that cotton sent upon the railways is badly handled and torn, and when it gets to the foreign country our commerce loses some of its value and breaks bulk because of the indifferent manner in which it has been handled. I would regret very much if the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to prescribe to the people of the South whether they should carry their cotton to New York on board ships from the mouth of the Mississippi River, or whether they should be compelled to carry it by steamboat to Pittsburgh and thence by rail to New York, or whether they should be compelled to carry their whole product by rail all the way, under the power to regulate the transportation of commerce intended for exportation abroad. He certainly would have a right to regulate the shipment of the cotton, the sugar, or the rice, or of any other commodity, and to prescribe the lines of transportation or the modes of transportation that that property should undergo before it is fixed for exportation abroad.

I must confess that I have never heard a sober opinion expressed by any man yet in the Senate which was so thoroughly violative of my views of the rights and powers of this Government upon a question of this kind as that which has been stated here to-day. It seems to me that latitudinarianism in the construction of the powers we have a right to confer upon our Federal authorities has got to be the order of the day, and a man only makes himself somewhat ridiculous by supposing that it is impossible that anything can be done at all that this Government can not do. I have supposed that the right of the people to conduct commerce between the States was not subject to such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury might be disposed to impose upon it. If after this debate a precedent of this kind is carried into the bill and into the law (as I suppose it will be, for there seems to be a majority here determined to pass the bill), we shall hereafter have no need of applying to anything but this act to justify the wildest extravagance in the exercise of any power whatsoever that we may choose to assert.

There would be some apparent check upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury as given in this section of the bill with reference to the condition of the property transported but for the latter part of it; that is to say, the earlier part of section 4 relates to the investigations of contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases in respect of live-stock, using in this case that phrase; but the latter part of it has no relation at all necessarily to diseased live-stock or live-stock which may carry communicable diseases from one part of the country to another. It has no reference to any supposed quarantine power for the protection of the people of the interior, but it gives to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to establish, under the imperative word "shall," from time to time, "such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigations may require."

I do not know how to argue a question of that character except to say that I never have heard before in all the discussions which have taken place upon this matter of construction that anybody had claimed that we could delegate to any officer of this Government the power to control the transportation of property through our limits according to his discretion.

It is not necessary to elaborate upon the abuses to which this power would be exposed or the dangers with which it would disturb the country. If you will give to any one man who has good sense and no principle in the United States—and we have plenty of that sort—the power conferred as proposed in the fourth section of the bill, there is nothing that that man can not do for the purpose of enriching himself and his friends, or for the purpose of acquiring and perpetuating autocratic power in this land, for if I had to-day an ambition that could be gratified only with the grasp of all the material power in this country, and were heartless enough, as we find men are heartless enough, to wreck and destroy people because of love of money or love of power, I could not ask that any one should give me a more potent instrumentality than to say to me, "Sir, you have the power in your discretion to regulate the transportation of live-stock or the transportation of property through this country either intended for exportation or intended for domestic use." Give me that power and the ambition and the villainy to use it for the oppression of this people, and I could destroy the people of the United States with it or else bring them obedient to my will under all conditions and circumstances.

Never was there a more dangerous or a more desperate grasp of power than that which is conferred by the terms of this bill. It is utterly indefensible. There is not a statesman of the olden time who for one moment would have allowed such a proposition as this to intrude itself within his mind. There is no precedent for it; there is no hint of authority for it. It is condemned out of the mouths of all men who have preceded us in the history of this Government, whether they were strict or whether they were liberal constructionists of the Constitution, to give to any one man the right to regulate the transportation of property through this country at his will and pleasure. Is it necessary, in order to establish this miserable little contrivance for paying a few men a small salary and gratifying the hay-seed party in this country, that we should make a raid like this upon the Constitution of the United States and put the whole power of the transportation of the live-stock of the country in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury without control or restraint?

Sir, it does seem to me that when Senators sometimes get their hearts set upon the gratification of a particular desire it is hardly worth while to make suggestions to them that they are violating an instrument which heretofore, if it has not now, had some sanction in the respect at least of the people of the United States. I repeat my surprise that a Senator of the bearing and ability of the Senator from Iowa should assert upon the floor of the Senate that we have a right to abdicate our authority which the Constitution in giving to us says we shall exercise—Congress shall regulate commerce between the States—that we can abdicate our authority and place that power in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and tell him, "Go, thou, and do as you please with this great and mighty power," which was intended, if it was ever intended to be exercised at all, to be exercised through the concurrent action of the two Houses, and that with the sanction of the President of the United States by his signing the bill. And then to think that the committee should bring such an assault as this into a miserable bill for the purpose of building up an inspection of diseased cattle in this country, and that passion, or freak, or frenzy, or whatever you please to call it, should have got such hold on the minds of intelligent gentlemen as that they would stumble along as they have through this bill into committing this country to the fatal error of conferring the whole power of controlling the transportation of the land into the hands of a single man, and he at the same time in the control of the Treasury of the United States.

If we must lodge this power in the hands of any man, do not let us put it in the hands of a man who controls the Treasury of the United States. He has power enough; yes, far too much. One of the curses under which this Government suffers to-day is the power lodged in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; and I, for one, shall hail with delight the day when the Treasury Department shall be divided into two distinct heads, and one shall stand for the receipt of customs and the other shall stand to keep an account of the expenditures. Here is the Secretary of the Treasury wielding the power of more than $300,000,000 of annual revenue coming into our vaults, and now we wish to annex to him, to this man of majesty and might holding the purse-strings of the country, the additional power of regulating absolutely by his own will the transportation of all diseased cattle, even extending to all the live-stock of the whole country.

I had supposed that when the suggestion was made to the Senator in charge of the bill the mere suggestion would have convinced the honorable Senator that there was a question presented in this fourth section sufficiently dangerous to condemn the entire bill to defeat, and which at the same time was entirely superfluous and unnecessary to the passage of the law or to its proper enforcement after it had passed; for surely after the Senate have confined the main purpose of the bill down to an investigation of the existence and character and extent of certain diseases of domestic animals there can be no reason, in order to carry into effect that power, that we should make this tremendous march to the front, reversing all the action of the Government up to this time, and that we should give to the Secretary of the Treasury the right to regulate absolutely the transportation of live-stock, whether intended for foreign exportation or domestic use, it makes no difference. He can prohibit a Texas drover from driving his cattle on foot. He can find a man a hundred miles from a railway train and say to him, "You may ship your cattle upon the railroad, but you must not drive them on foot." That is transportation. He can select a river that he chooses to patronize, a line of steamers he chooses to patronize, his political friends, his agents and his emissaries, and his friends, say to them, "Take this transportation; you are good friends of ours and we are likely to hear from this subject in the next Presidential election."

Ah, Mr. President, it need not be said that politicians striving for the high offices of this Government will not do things as bad and far worse than that. I myself within the last few days presented to the Senate a report from the Department of Justice in which it was stated that a man in my own State who had been indicted for perjury in the circuit court of the United States, and for some half-dozen or more other offenses connected with the discharge of the duties of the very office which he now holds, had been appointed by the President of the United States in the face of the record that contained those indictments and at the time when the Department of Justice was honestly and efficiently and in good faith prosecuting that man for these crimes. Not only so, but notwithstanding the expiration of the term of office that man holds his place to-day, and the reward that he is bringing to the Administration is that he circulates from county to county and from district to district in my State for the purpose of influencing the Republican colored representatives there to vote for Arthur for President. This is but one of a series that I could detail upon this floor. The records of the Senate show what I have stated; yes, the report of the Attorney-General shows it.

In the presence of acts like these let not Senators console themselves with the belief that they can confer a power like this upon the Secretary of the Treasury and that they will not find a watchful people to see what abuses it is open to. If the President of the United States will appoint a man and send his name to the Senate for the office of marshal of the middle and southern district of Alabama when the records of the very court in which he is appointed contain indictments pending against him for perjury and those indictments are being prosecuted by the Department of Justice, it is idle for us to say that the tinge of shame will color the cheek of any man in doing anything that he may have the power to do in order to increase his political influence in this country.

I am not unmindful of these things, and when we begin to confer powers upon the Secretary of the Treasury of this unusual and abnormal character, of this dangerous character to the liberties of this people and their rights under the law and Constitution both, the Senator from Kansas need not attempt to assuage my fears by saying that he has faith that the Secretary of the Treasury will never abuse these powers. We have had faith in many men, and one of the chiefest of our misfortunes this very day is that we have too often reposed faith instead of relying upon the checks of a positive law to keep men to their duty.

The facts to which I have referred are now in the hands of your Judiciary Committee. I suppose that committee will not give us a response to the instruction of the Senate until after this political campaign has passed over. The Departments of this Government are to-day being used, as everybody on this floor must know, for the purpose of subserving personal politics, party politics being a secondary consideration.

Sir, in the face of these facts, is the Senate of the United States to indulge itself in conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury powers as broad as those which are contained in the fourth section of this bill, and are we to be soothed into quietude by the dulcet tones of the voice of the honorable Senator from Kansas, who is an excellent, good-hearted man, when he tells us, "Have no apprehensions, my brethren; the Secretaries of the Treasury that we are going to keep in place are not going to abuse their trust?" God will that it may be so; but in the light of past experience, and very modern experience, I must say that I apprehend there is some danger.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Alabama will look at the statutes of 1882, page 313, he will find that this dangerous power has been exercised, or at least has been authorized to be exercised, by the Secretary of the Treasury for the past two years. In a paragraph of the sundry civil appropriation act there occurs this language, which was repeated in the act for the succeeding year:

To enable the Secretary of the Treasury to co-operate with State and municipal authorities, and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of neat cattle by land or water, in establishing regulations for the safe conveyance of such cattle from the interior to the seaboard, and the shipment thereof, so that such cattle may not be exposed to the disease known as pleuro-pneumonia or lung-plague.

Not the transportation of diseased cattle, but the transportation of well cattle in such a way that they may not be exposed——

Mr. MORGAN. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall co-operate.

Mr. PLUMB:

And to prevent the spread of said disease, and to establish quarantine stations—

Not in co-operation with anybody—and provide proper shelter for neat cattle imported, at such ports as he may deem necessary, the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, he puts a convenient interpretation upon that section. All that is done there is by co-operation, not only with the States concerned, but with the men engaged in the transportation.

Mr. PLUMB. Imagine the authority of the United States co-operating with an individual! The individual would shrink to the proportions of a welt on a sound, large human body. The potentiality of the power of the United States in that case is the main thing and the only thing. The Secretary of the Treasury under that provision has just as ample power as he could possibly have under the proposed act which has been the subject of the animadversion of the Senator from Alabama, and that is repeated, as I said, in the act of the succeeding year found on page 613 of the same volume.

Mr. MAXEY. The provision which the Senator has read is confined to pleuro-pneumonia?

Mr. PLUMB. Yes.

Mr. MAXEY. It does not extend to "communicable diseases."

Mr. PLUMB. It does not say anything about Texas cattle or Texas fever, I assure the Senator from Texas.

So far as the argument in regard to the constitutional question is concerned, I do not care to enter upon that at all. The Senator from Alabama rests himself upon the unwisdom of this power being committed to anybody, and yet in the bill which he assisted in reporting to the Senate, which he stated yesterday that he favored, and which he has, I think, in the last few minutes stated that he did favor, a great deal more power upon a variety of subjects of the utmost interest to the people of the United States is committed to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of the Treasury. I wonder that the hair on the head of the Senator from Alabama did not stand on end when he read in section 18—

That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any adulterated or unwholesome food, or vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, &c.

The question as to whether the food is unwholesome or not is to be settled by the edict of the Secretary of the Treasury himself or by a subordinate instructed by him. More than that, in section 20 it is provided that "whenever the President is satisfied that there is good reason to believe that any importation is being made or is about to be made into the United States" of something that he does not think ought to come within the confines of the United States he is authorized to put an embargo upon it in advance. If he hears that in some of the vineyards in the wine-growing districts of France the phylloxera prevails, or some other thing which affects injuriously, according to his own sweet will and pleasure, the product of that district, and that it is likely to be imported into the United States, he is authorized at once to issue a proclamation forbidding anything from that section of country coming within the confines of his jurisdiction. Yet the Senator from Alabama, having strained at the gnat which is contained in the bill before the Senate, is prepared to swallow the saw-mill contained in the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations; and so all the way through. There is not a section in the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations that does not commit to the President of the United States power a hundred-fold stronger, more absolute, and more summary than all the powers that are committed by the bill under consideration to the Commissioner of Agriculture or to any other official.

Mr. President, this power so committed by the law heretofore has not been misused. It has not been sufficiently ample and somebody has got to have this discretion. It is not going to do to settle these questions by trial by jury, nor to await the slow and tedious processes of the law in regard to emergencies such as may at any time arise. This power must be lodged somewhere, and it is to the credit of the Government and to the credit of the people of the United States, the Senator from Alabama to the contrary notwithstanding, that this power has not been abused. I do not doubt that some marshal in Alabama has abused his power, and it may be, as he says, that he is down there now drumming up delegates for the Administration in anticipation of the Chicago convention; but that does not go to this case at all. We do not propose to commit this to an accidental marshal. This is committed to the responsible head of the administration. It is a matter in which there is no chance for personal profit, for any item of personal concern to enter into it. It can not be a question between two lines of transportation. There is nothing in which any Secretary of the Treasury or any President of the United States in the exercise of the power committed by this bill could consult the personal interests of any human being whatever. He might exercise it unwisely no doubt; he might administer it too laxly; he might administer it too stringently; but that he will administer it according to an unbiased judgment there can be no doubt whatever; and this power has to be committed somewhere, to somebody. While the Senator from Alabama is so apprehensive about it, the people who are to be affected by it, who own the herds of this country, who own the stock throughout its length and breadth, as a rule are in favor of it, and do not fear the exercise of the power provided for in this section.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas, referring to a statute now on the books giving the Secretary of the Treasury certain power in relation to cattle afflicted by pleuro-pneumonia, saw proper, in replying to a question, to make a fling at me by a reference to Texas cattle, which of course I was endeavoring to protect. Now I say to that Senator on the subject of Texas cattle I propose to cast just such votes as I please, without the slightest regard to his criticisms. The point which I made is apparent to the Senate, that that law gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power specified only in the case of a specific disease, determinable by testimony in case the question was raised; but where you include infectious or other communicable diseases, that opens a wide field, and gives to the Secretary of the Treasury a discretion never given to him by any law placed on the statute-book.

In 1879 we had before the Senate a bill in relation to the transportation of animals, and that was very thoroughly discussed and the whole subject of inspection came up during that discussion. That bill was pressed with as much earnestness and zeal as this bill is. At that time, doing what I believed to be my duty, I took occasion to lay before the Senate my views. There it was proposed that the Commissioner of Agriculture should appoint inspectors of stock at every port from which stock was exported in the United States, practically beginning at Portland, Me., and winding up with Portland, Oreg. I could not see the propriety of that, and while that was the central point of that bill, I opposed it and on that occasion said:

What good will a certificate in the pocket of the owner or in the hands of the consignee of those cattle or those sheep or swine do in London, in Liverpool, in Havre de Grace, or anywhere else to which this live-stock or these dressed animals may be shipped? Bills of health of a ship are viséed by the officers of the government to which that ship is to sail, not by the officers of the government from which the ship is to sail. We, the other day, in the yellow-fever bill, in guarding against contagion, required that a bill of health should be given by the officers of our Government in South America or elsewhere where a contagious disease might be, to show that the vessel which was to sail to our ports did not have such a disease upon it. It is our officers who are to give the certificate to a vessel coming to this country, and so I say that after you may pass such a measure as this and appoint all your inspectors the certificates given by them will not be worth the paper they are written upon in any part of the world, because the governments to which the shipments are made will be governed by the reports and inspections of their own officers. You would make this system cost the people of the United States this large sum, for I tell you that under the provisions of this bill there will be an inspector at every port of this Union; and you will not only make it cost this large amount to the Government of the United States, but to every man who ships cattle, sheep, or swine it will cost these additional fees, which will aggregate a very large amount.

I take interest in this question because the State which I in part represent is to-day the largest cattle-producing State in this Union, producing under the census of 1870 3,991,158 cattle. That number will be increased by the census of 1880 to not less than 6,000,000. We raised, as shown by the census of 1870, 714,351 sheep. The last reliable data that we have, published by the Wool-Producers' Association of the United States at Boston, shows that to-day California is ahead in sheep, Ohio second, and Texas third, so that we may reasonably estimate, and I give this as my opinion, that by the census of 1880 we will have in Texas at least 2,000,000 sheep, and in all probability two and a half million. We had of swine in 1870 1,202,445. We can raise just as many as we want, for ours is a great corn and mast State, and the product of corn is yearly increasing.

At this time the principal shipment of live-stock in which we are concerned is that of cattle, and we are using every exertion to open up a direct trade in our cattle with Europe. We can send just as many cattle to market as we please, and will do so when we find it profitable. I call the attention of every Senator in the Chamber who represents a cattle-producing State to the fact that under the provisions of this bill the cattle-raiser, the sheep-raiser, and the swine-raiser are largely charged with fees to be paid to the inspector or somebody else, for, mark you, it is not provided in the bill that the fees thus raised are to go back into the Treasury of the United States to pay the $1,500 salary. That is a separate and distinct clause, and in addition to that $1,500 salary the fees are to be charged, as the bill is worded, to the owners.

But, underneath all this, what good will your certificate do? Sir, this is no new question to gentlemen who keep up with the cattle business.

In that connection I quoted this:

You will find in the New York Herald, of April 27, 1879, a dispatch from Ottawa, Ontario, Canada, dated April 26, 1879, as follows:

"In the house of commons, during a discussion on the item of $10,000 in the estimates for a cattle quarantine, Mr. Mackenzie brought up the matter of the shipment of cattle to England. He hoped that the inability to allow the transshipment of American cattle through Canada to England would be removed as soon as possible, as that trade was very valuable.

"Mr. Pope said he had asked the privy council whether, if American cattle were carefully examined by veterinary surgeons at ports of entry and shipment, American cattle could be sent by Canada to England? The answer was that there was no alternative. If such shipments were permitted Canadian cattle must be shut out of the English market. Diseased cattle from Portland have been landed in England as late as the 1st of April. None have been sent from Canada."

So you will see that the British Government will depend upon her own inspectors, not upon the certificates which may be given here, because nations are exceedingly jealous; nations will be guided by the official reports of those officers appointed by them and responsible to them.

I read that for the purpose of showing that any certificate of health given by an officer of the United States Government would not be worth in England the paper it was written upon. Now, in support of that I wish to call attention to what veterinary surgeons of the Treasury Department, James Law and E. F. Thayer, said in a report sent by the Treasury Department to the House of Representatives on the 28th of December last. I ask the Secretary to read the part I have marked.

The Secretary read as follows:

First. The great plagues of which our customer, England, is especially afraid, and to exclude which she keeps up the present restrictions on American cattle, are lung-plague and Texas fever. Neither of these diseases can be certainly detected by an examination at the port of export. As contracted in the ordinary way, by exposure to contagion, each of these affections passed through an average period of incubation or latency of thirty days, and during all these thirty days it is impossible for the most accomplished expert to detect the presence of the germ in the system. Cattle, therefore, that had been exposed to infection within seven days antecedent, as would usually happen, if at all, in the stock-yards at New York, Jersey City, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, would, without exception, pass the inspection triumphantly, but a considerable number would almost infallibly show marked symptoms of the disease before they would be slaughtered in England three weeks later. What, then, would be thought of our certificates of health?

Second. It is of the nature of an argumentum ad ignorantiam. Whatever value it can be supposed to possess is based on the presumption that the English Government and people will recognize it as a guarantee against the further shipment of infected cattle to England. But those who will consider the nature of the diseases to be provided against will denounce it at once as being utterly insufficient as a measure of protection, and those who are less acquainted with them will be convinced sooner or later of its futility when cattle, which arrive with a certificate of soundness, are found to be in the active stages of a contagious disease.

Third. The great body of English landholders, and all veterinarians, will view the matter at once as an attempt to obtain a concession by an appeal to what is not a reality but a false appearance, and they will only become the more confirmed in their purpose of excluding American cattle from competition in their home beef market.

Fourth. The examination of export cattle and the giving of a certificate of soundness will be misleading to our own breeders, shippers, and insurance agents, for they will naturally look upon this certificate as an assurance of soundness, and when the cattle thus certified sound are condemned by the English inspectors, it will produce a natural ill-feeling between the two nations, and charges of incompetency or misrepresentation on the part of American or English veterinarians, and finally when the true state of the case is known, to charges against the American Government for giving what purports to be a guarantee of health when no real guarantee of health can be given.

Fifth. The proposed certificates granted to exported cattle can only lead to discredit of our veterinary sanitary system as a whole. In spite of the certificates infected cattle will continue to arrive in England as before, so that the certificates will be held up to ridicule, and every other measure which we may have adopted for the suppression of the existing animal plagues or which we may hereafter adopt will be viewed with equal discredit, so that the action must prove inimical rather than favorable to the removal of the English restrictions.

Sixth. It ought to be stated that the measure proposed has already been practically adopted. Most of the exporters at New York and Boston are, or were, in the habit of employing a veterinarian to examine their export cattle and furnish a certificate of soundness for use in the English port. Again, as a rule, the underwriters generally demand such an examination and certificate to protect them against losses from the shipment of animals that are diseased or otherwise unfitted to undergo the voyage, and yet cattle have been condemned on arrival at the English ports of which the shippers testify that they have been so examined. More than this, cattle shipped from Boston and Portland, where no lung-plague exists, and where there has been no foot-and-mouth disease for thirteen years, have in spite of these examinations and certificates been condemned, some as suffering from lung-plague and some from foot-and-mouth disease. In the face of such facts it is surely preposterous to propose an official inspection and guarantee. It may be claimed that the disinfection of ships, attendants, &c., as recommended in our report, will remove the danger of that infection on board ship, which doubtless operated in some of the cases referred to, yet it demonstrates that a disease may be marked at Liverpool which was absent or unrecognizable three weeks before in America.

Seventh. To those who hope that inspection and certificates will have an immediate effect in relaxing or removing the English restrictions we commend a candid reading of Professor Brown's letter, quoted in our report. The difficulty, he says, which they have to contend with is that from time to time cattle arrive from the United States suffering from contagious diseases. We well know and confess that a simple inspection at the port of export can not prevent the recurrence of this. No veterinarian worthy of the name would risk his reputation on his power of recognizing lung-plague or Texas fever during the period of incubation, nor without a period of detention under his supervision. So long, therefore, as we can not seclude our infected districts, we can never hope to prevent the landing in England of American cattle suffering from one or other of these diseases, and so long as our cattle show these diseases on arrival in England we can hope for no modification or removal of the present restrictions.

It must be added that Professor Brown has just assured the Royal Agricultural Society of England that if British farmers want to protect themselves against the importation of foreign diseases there is no other alternative than to secure absolute prohibition of the importation of all live animals from countries as to which the privy council are not satisfied that they are perfectly free from contagious diseases, and that in face of this they adopted a petition to Parliament to carry out such restriction.

This holds out little hope of the removal of the English restrictions upon our export cattle consequent on an inspection on shipment, but it does suggest to us the one proper and economical course for our Federal and State governments, namely, to utterly extirpate our imported preventable animal plagues, and redeem to the nation its birthright of wholesome pastures, sound herds, and abundant and unobjectionable food.

Mr. MAXEY. It will be seen by reference to the report of the veterinary surgeons of the Treasury Department, first, that no certificate granted by the officers of the United States of inspection will weigh anything whatever in any of the foreign ports; and second, that it is misleading to the shipper himself; and third, that no veterinary surgeon can tell whether or not the cattle which are brought up for shipment are diseased at the time, because the disease does not develop itself often for thirty days. That being true in respect to foreign shipments, that being true in respect to cattle on board ships, is it not equally true in sending them on board railway trains for interstate trade? So then, so far as this great power is given to the Secretary of the Treasury to stop the shipment of cattle according to the very testimony furnished, it is a power that if granted can not be wisely exercised. So then it occurs to me that both the fourth and fifth sections of this bill are directly in the face and teeth of the report sent by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of Representatives in respect to these very clauses of this bill now being considered by the Senate.

This is no new thing here. We had Senate bill 1667, April 23, 1880, on the same subject; March 15, 1880, Senate bill 1473; Senate bill 570, December 16, 1881, and Senate bill 593, December 19, 1881. All these bills have been before the Senate at different times, and the discussion of this question has been exhaustive. Now, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry reports this bill, and from the beginning to the end it is torn all to pieces by the Senate after it gets here. Unquestionably the bill when it was brought in was vicious, in my judgement of the very worst form and character. It has been greatly benefited, greatly advantaged by the amendments which have been made in the Senate; but that the bill has been brought in without mature deliberation and consideration is evident from the fact that the Senate has wisely stricken out many of what the committee regarded as the most material and important parts of the bill.

The Senator from California [Mr. MILLER] came in yesterday evening with an amendment to this bill changing the nature and character of it. In my judgment this bill ought to meet with the fate which its predecessors have always met: should be sent back to the committee to be re-examined; but the votes taken indicate its passage. Still I prefer to make the points I have, that they may be considered before final action by the two Houses is had.

It may do very well for the Senator from Kansas to sneer at Texas cattle. He ought to bear in mind that Texas is the first cattle State in the Union, and is a competitor for the cattle trade with many other States, and whether he likes them or not, or whether the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS], who was disposed to laugh at any cattle except those raised on blue grass, ought to know that whether he likes them or not other people do; and there are sold annually upon the markets of the world hundreds of thousands of Texas cattle, bringing millions of money into the country. Whether he likes them or not, many men do like them, and they are satisfied with them, and it would probably be a good thing for some if that great cattle trade was kept out. But it can not be.

They have even gone to the trouble of calling a particular disease "Texas fever," when the very evidence of the veterinarians of the Treasury Department and of the Commissioner of Agriculture shows that the disease which they now call the "Texas fever" has been in existence in this country for one hundred and fifty years, and one hundred and fifty years ago you had no settlements west of the Ohio or west of the Mississippi, and Texas was an unknown land, and yet this disease then existed. Sir, there is something in a name, and this was probably given for a purpose.

In respect to pleuro-pneumonia it is a remarkable fact that from the beginning to the end pleuro-pneumonia is kept to the front of this bill, but with the expression "contagious, infectious, or communicable disease." I ask you, sir, if you can not strike out the word "pleuro-pneumonia" entirely and if the bill would not be just as good without it as with it, for if you give that discretion as to what is infectious, what is communicable, what is contagious, there is no need of specifying any one by name.

The only true way, if you want to strike at any disease, is to name it, so that if the case should arise in court the evidence could be brought up in respect to that particular disease; but when you give this broad sweeping power to determine, first, what is an infectious, contagious, or communicable disease and then to stop it, you give a power which the Czar of Russia does not to-day possess. The Shah of Persia never possessed greater power than would be possessed by the executive officers of this Government under this bill. You might as well say in a code of criminal law that murder and all other felonies should be punished at the discretion of the court and jury without specifying what the other felonies were, leaving it to the court undefined to determine what was a felony. Here you name one disease and you tack on to that, under the broad, sweeping name of "contagious, infectious, or communicable disease," any and every disease which in the discretion of those whom he sends out broadcast over the country may think such, and underlying all that is what I said before. These very surgeons themselves of the Treasury Department say they can not tell when a shipment is made whether or not the animals are thus infected. Sir, it is giving a power over the commerce of the country never contemplated by the Constitution, in my judgment. It is a dangerous feature. It is one of the many measures which of late years have been sprung upon this country concentrating all power in the Federal Government at the expense of the States and the people.

How many cattle have died of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia and how many States have tried to exterminate it? It was charged that it was in your State, Mr. President (Mr. PLATT in the chair), and I believe you proved very conclusively that it was not there. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] denied that it was in his State. It is said there are some cases in Pennsylvania, none in Delaware, a few cases in Maryland, and that is about the sum and substance of it, and a few here in this District. Where it came from I do not know, and I believe it is charged that there may be some down in Virginia, but the charge does not seem to be very well sustained. That is the whole affair. And as to pleuro-pneumonia, the veterinary surgeons lead us to conclude that the disease is of foreign origin, and that the healthy cattle shipped from the United States contract the disease on board vessels which have carried cattle thus infected. The remedy in such cases is not inspection of the cattle, but in thoroughly disinfecting ships and cars which carry cattle. But across the Alleghany Mountains, in that vast cattle region extending from Wyoming south to the Gulf and west of the Mississippi River, there has never been known a single case of this pleuro-pneumonia.

I believe in going slow about these things. It is but a short time ago that we had up a bill for the foot-and-mouth disease. I might say something about Kansas cattle, for my distinguished friend saw proper to speak about Texas cattle. Cattle in Kansas which had stood in the mud and had their feet frozen—it was rumored throughout the length and breadth of this country and sent abroad that cattle so afflicted all over the State of Kansas had the foot-and-mouth disease. That discussion did this country many millions of dollars of injury. If we had wanted to sustain the action of the house of commons in respect to their pending legislation, no better course could have been pursued to do it. But when the facts came out what was it? It was a great scare—it was a great panic. It was no foot-and-mouth disease. Yet a bill was hurried through this body, aided by telegrams, which I had the honor of voting against, I am very proud to say, and I suppose it will never become a law; but the testimony has come before the country. The consent of another House is necessary before it becomes a law.

That has been the history of this matter. For some reason or other there has been a persistent and a continuous effort in the last few years to bring this subject before the country as a matter of national legislation. The country has been in existence and going on very well, so far as I know, from the first settlement in Virginia in 1607 and in Massachusetts in 1620, and all this time the States have regulated these things very well. The pleuro-pneumonia you may have in a few States; it seems to have been confined there. It has never got beyond there. What little so-called foot-and-mouth disease you may have in Kansas can be very well provided against by taking better care of the cattle. It is not spreading.

There is some motive in all this attempt constantly to bring this subject up and make it a question of national legislation. The facts came out in the progress of the debate on the so-called foot-and-mouth disease that your own State, sir, has wholesome, well-guarded laws for the control of that whole matter, and you have done it, and every State has sufficient power to protect itself against the introduction of diseased cattle from anywhere. There is nothing in the Missouri decision to the contrary in regard to that. They have the right to do that.

I regard this bill as it now stands, stripped as it is of a very large portion of its worst features, as dangerous in the introduction of legislation calculated to centralize all power where it does not belong and to deprive the proper authorities of the States where it does belong of the exercise of this necessary power in protecting themselves against the introduction of infectious or contagious diseases; and in so far as pleuro-pneumonia is concerned, limited as it is to a very few herds and a very few States, why should this great cattle industry of the United States, of such importance to the West, be stopped or placed in a position where it can be stopped, because you place all the cattle States as under a lever with the long end of the lever in the possession of the Secretary of the Treasury? He can not in person exercise this authority; he must do it by his agents. Take the first section of this bill. I call the attention of the Senate to this:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture shall organize in his Department a bureau of animal industry, and shall appoint a chief thereof, who shall be a competent veterinary surgeon, and whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the number—value, and condition of the domestic animals of the United States.

Mark you—

It would take a thousand men to faithfully carry out that and more.

Mr. ALLISON. "Number" and "value" have already been stricken from the bill.

Mr. COKE. That amendment was agreed to late yesterday.

Mr. MAXEY. Then take out "number" and "value," and I am very glad indeed to hear, as I only reached here yesterday evening, that they have been taken out, because the expense of that would have been incalculable. But that only partially removes the objection. Take it as it stands now, and I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this in the bill:

Whose duty it shall be to investigate and report upon the condition of the domestic animals.

It is true that you stop him from inquiring into the number anywhere and into the value of the herds, but how can he examine the condition of the herds unless he goes through them? How can he investigate a herd unless he goes through it? And when you set men to work to go through all the herds of cattle in this country and investigate their condition as to disease and report upon it, you have an army of office-holders necessary to do it. It would take at a low estimate a thousand, and yet it is said the number shall not exceed twenty.

If there is any sincerity about the bill, if it means what it says, if there is to be a practical actual investigation of these cattle, a personal inspection, an ocular examination of cattle as to their condition, that can not be done in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury or in that of the Commissioner of Agriculture. How can you tell the condition of a herd of cattle from statistical reports? You have to go and examine them; that is the only way to do it; so that twenty, it will be found, is a matter of no importance; it would scarcely be a beginning. That is the first section. Then you come to the second section:

That the Commissioner of Agriculture is authorized to appoint two competent agents, who shall be practical stock-raisers or experienced business men, familiar with questions pertaining to commercial transactions in live-stock.

Stop a moment right there—"practical stock-raisers or experienced business men." The knowledge of a stock-raiser and of an experienced business man may be as different as the knowledge of a lawyer and of an auctioneer. One handles cattle in the herd, raises them up from calves, knows all about their habits, their character, their nature, the diseases to which they are susceptible; whereas the practical business man may know nothing whatever about these things. It does not even follow that a stock-buyer understands all these diseases, because he buys the cattle after they are ready for market and then butchers or sells them. So the two characters are entirely distinct. But what then? They are—

To examine and report upon the best methods of treating, transporting, and caring for animals, and the means to be adopted for the suppression and extirpation of contagious pleuro-pneumonia, and to provide against the spread of other contagious, infectious, and communicable diseases.

So you have here two sets of officers, one set of officers provided for by the first section, and another provided for by the second section, and made in the same words, each to report upon the best method of stopping these contagious and infectious diseases. The whole bill shows a want of care in its expression, as is conclusively and abundantly established by the fact that the Senate has torn the bill all to pieces.

As to these two sections, there is no need for these two sets of officers. As to the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh sections, they authorize an inspection, and the very men of all others best qualified to say whether or not that inspection will be of account tell us here in the report which I have read, the men sent out by the Secretary of the Treasury himself, that it is utterly idle and useless to have that inspection for foreign shipment, and, as I said before, if it is not of value for foreign shipments, in the name of common sense how much better is it for interstate shipments? So what is the good principle of this bill I am wholly unable to see. To me it is unwise and utterly inefficient for any good purpose.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I did not expect to say anything more on this bill, for I have spoken so often that I am much more anxious to get to a vote than to discuss it any further; but we are entering upon a new scene. We are this morning about to enter upon a new field of discussion, which threatens to be as wide perhaps as the one we have gone over. Since the return of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MAXEY], who has not been present and heard all the discussion upon this question within the last week or ten days, he has had read at the desk of the Secretary a statement made by the Treasury Cattle Commission in regard to the difficulties of a mere inspection at the ports from which our cattle are shipped abroad of the cattle themselves to ascertain whether they can be sent abroad with a sound bill of health. The whole purpose of that report and its argument was merely to show that the diseases of which our foreign customers complain are so insidious and so slow in their development that without knowing from where the cattle have come, without knowing all the circumstances that surround them, without knowing whether they come from infected States or districts or not, it is not possible for the veterinary surgeon at the port of shipment to go through three or four hundred cattle apparently in good health and say that those cattle are absolutely healthy and fit to be shipped abroad. It was in favor of some quarantine arrangement in the States where the cattle are raised and from which they are brought to these ports that these remarks in regard to the difficulties of inspection were made. They advocate not only quarantine arrangements and examination in the States, but also examinations at the port of shipment.

The purposes of this bill are twofold: one to give assurance to our foreign customers that we are sending them wholesome food and healthy animals, and the other is to protect our own herds from malignant diseases which we know to have domiciled themselves in certain States of this Union. These are the two purposes, and how are they to be accomplished? They are to be accomplished by investigations and by measures taken by Congress upon those investigations to prevent the spread of these diseases from one State into another, and to prevent their being shipped abroad to contaminate the cattle of foreign countries in the bodies of our own cattle that we send.

It is folly for the Senator from Texas to contend that there is no disease among Texas cattle. There is not a well-informed farmer or cattle-man in the whole West who does not know that they are diseased. The writers on this subject say that every one of them has a latent disease in its body, that that disease is peculiar to these warm latitudes near the coast and around the great swamps of the South; that it is a species of malarial poison peculiar to that climate in which the young animal is born, in which he is reared, and to which his constitution becomes accustomed until he is proof in his own life against the effects of the poison, and if taken from his own native pastures to a more genial and higher northern climate he carries with him the power of communicating it to other cattle and destroying them.

These are facts. I myself have seen thousands of native cattle killed by grazing upon the same pastures with Texas cattle. In my own State and in the State of Illinois I have seen the Texas cattle smiting the prairies in every direction. I remember a friend of mine in Kentucky some years ago brought from New Orleans three or four hundred broad-horned Texas steers. He landed them at Mills Point from a steamboat, drove them across the country to the vicinity of Lexington, and in every pasture where he grazed them the native cattle that followed them upon that pasture were killed by the disease they left upon the grass. In Jessamine County in the pasture of a friend who had one hundred and fifty short-horns one of these cattle stopped, broken down, weary of travel. That animal infected those short-horns and killed nearly the entire herd. They were carried up to Fayette and Bourboun and Graves counties, and all the cattle that followed them on the same pastures afterward died of disease, until it would have been worth more than his life was to have brought another importation into that State.

I saw in Illinois once, immediately in the neighborhood of where I had a farm, a lot of Texas cattle brought there, seven hundred or eight hundred in number, by the head of the old Fall River in Fayette County, and I saw these great long-horns mingling with the herds of that State, and hundreds and thousands of the cattle died with the disease, and not a Texas bullock died. They grew and fattened and throve faster than they had done in their native prairies of the South. Examination of these cattle when brought in shows that they are diseased. An eminent English veterinarian was hired by the State of Illinois to investigate the subject. He examined more than 2,000 in the city of Chicago, and in every instance the spleen of the Texas animal was six times the size of that of an ordinary native steer, showing that it was a splenetic disease; but after remaining in that State one year that organ was reduced to its normal condition and size. All States and all men are familiar with the fact that one of these cattle taken from Texas to the North will increase in weight, in growth, and in fat twice as fast in a month as he would have done in Texas, because he gets in better health. An animal may have a disease upon him that he may communicate to somebody else and kill that person, and yet not die himself. In the human family there are instances of that kind. But I had thought after we had adopted the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] that we should have had very little difficulty in the passage of this bill, allowing his cattle to be shipped to market in cars and taken out and fed in lots, so as not to graze on pastures at all seasons of the year. The Senator from Texas [Mr. COKE] admitted the fact that Texas cattle would kill at certain seasons of the year if they were taken North and grazed upon the same pastures with the native cattle of the country.

Mr. COKE. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that I indicated the months in which Northern cattle following Texas cattle, pasturing on the same ground, would take the disease.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly what I say, and if that be the fact it is an admission of the whole question. It gives the argument up; it is stronger than anything I have said.

Mr. COKE. I stated further that those were the only conditions under which the disease is transmittible; that you might put the Texas cattle and the Northern cattle in the same car and transport them together and the disease would not be communicated; that you can put them in the same lot and one of them in the same stall and feed them on grass, and the disease is not communicated. It is only where the Northern cattle are pastured upon the same field where the Texas cattle have grazed over that they communicate the disease.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is exactly the danger against which we propose to provide.

Mr. COKE. And one white frost puts a stop to the whole thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Exactly.

Mr. COKE. And I will mention further, as you have brought up the subject—I hate to repeat it; we have been over it so often—that you may take a Northern cow affected with this disease and put her with other Northern cattle and she can not communicate it; she will not transmit it. It can be transmitted but once. The animal that takes it has no contagious disease, because no other animal can take it from that one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In other words, it takes it in a modified form. Admitting all that to be true, take the first part of the admission, that they do communicate a disease that is fatal and destructive to every animal that follows upon the same pasture; it is a reason why a limitation should be put upon that traffic. The State of Texas has imposed none. The other States north of Texas have endeavored to do it, but the Supreme Court of the United States has decided that the States have not the power; that the power to regulate commerce belongs to the General Government. Then when we appeal to the General Government the Senator from Texas says, "We understand that thing down there very well, and we have undertaken to regulate it ourselves; our men have quit driving at dangerous seasons of the year, and if they do drive, a shotgun in Kansas and Arkansas and the States above keeps them back." Sir, I am not willing to trust to the honor and good faith of the cattle-growers. I am not willing to resort to the violence of the shotgun. I want law to govern this thing. I want the law to say upon investigations made by men of science that if they ascertain that Texas cattle can not be carried out of that State during certain seasons of the year without danger to our herds their transportation shall be restrained by law and not by violence. That is all.

The gentlemen are constantly asserting that we are scandalizing our own American cattle and destroying their currency in Europe by talking about cattle disease in the Senate. See what the newspapers say. The newspapers yesterday and to-day are stating that this disease has broken out afresh in the State of Pennsylvania in Washington County. I saw it this morning in the Louisville Courier-Journal. I have seen it in several papers here. I read yesterday a letter from a member of Congress from that very district in Pennsylvania to attest the fact that the disease was not only in existence but that it was spreading and likely to spread.

Mr. COKE. What disease?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Pleuro-pneumonia. Now, what we want with our cattle that we ship abroad is not only that we may slaughter them in the public abattoirs at the very place where the ships arrive, but that the graziers of England shall have the right to take them into the interior of the country and fix them up and finish them off for first-class beef. That is what we want; but now no English grazier is safe in taking a Texas steer shipped there unless he knows that it was started from this country after the fall of the frost, and we do not have any frost in June or July or August. The Senator from Texas admits that after a fall of frost they are not dangerous anywhere. If these cattle are taken to England before the frost falls, they can not be taken to the farms in that country, because they would carry disease with them and infect or communicate it to the native cattle, and the British Government never will remove the restriction upon our trade until this thing is done.

We want these investigations to continue, and as the necessities of the case may occur hereafter amend the bill so as to embrace other cases or so as to exempt them from the operations of this bill. What we do want is to place in the hands of our authorities power when we send cattle abroad to accompany them with a bill of health sound and good, saying to those people, "These cattle may be relied upon with absolute assurance as being in a condition not to communicate any disease to your herds if you take them inland;" and when you do that you have accomplished an immense benefit for the country. Those restrictions never will be removed until we do something of this sort. The British Government does not know the State governments of this country. They recognize only one government, and that is the Government of the United States, not the separate States of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, or Illinois, but the whole United States. They respect no assurance from the authorities anywhere except from the authorities of the National Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. JONES, of Florida. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed, in section 4, line 11, to strike out "and transportation;" so as to read:

Who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation of live-stock as the results of said investigation may require.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HAMPTON (when Mr. COLQUITT'S name was called). The Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin (when Mr. MCPHERSON'S name was called). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired upon this question with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

Mr. SLATER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE], who is away with the Committee on the District of Columbia, is paired on this bill. He would vote for the amendment if present.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GIBSON. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. MILLER, of New York (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA]. As he is not in the Chamber, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRYE. Believing that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] would vote "yea," I will vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—12.

Bayard,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,
Call,	George,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Sewell.

NAYS—24.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Van Wyck,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Vest,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Voorhees,
Cullom,	Lapham,	Platt,	Williams,
Dolph,	Logan,	Plumb,	Wilson.

ABSENT—40.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Ingalls,	Pendleton,
Anthony,	Fair,	Jackson,	Pike,
Beck,	Farley,	Jonas,	Pugh,
Blair,	Gibson,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Bowen,	Gorman,	Kenna,	Sabin,
Brown,	Groome,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Butler,	Hale,	McPherson,	Sherman,
Camden,	Harris,	Mahone,	Slater,
Cameron of Pa.,	Harrison,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Hill,	Palmer.	Walker.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No quorum voting, the Secretary will call the Senate.

The Secretary called the roll, and 45 Senators responded to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call of the Senate discloses forty-five Senators present. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] on all amendments.

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], but believing that if present he would vote "yea," I shall vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. If he were here, I should vote for the amendment.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GIBSON. My colleague [Mr. JONAS] is paired with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. CAMERON]. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL].

Mr. GROOME. My colleague [Mr. GORMAN] is paired on all questions connected with this bill with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

Mr. KENNA. My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. RANSOM. I find that I was mistaken as to the gentleman with whom my colleague is paired. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON]. My colleague is paired, and I may be wrong about the Senator with whom he is paired.

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—15.

Bayard,	Frye,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,
Beck,	George,	Kenna,	Ransom,
Call,	Groome,	Lamar,	Sewell.
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,

NAYS—25.

Allison,	Garland,	Miller of Cal.,	Vest,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hale,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Williams,
Conger,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Lapham,	Platt,
Dolph,	Logan,	Plumb,
Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,

ABSENT—36.

Aldrich,	Dawes,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Anthony,	Fair,	Jonas,	Riddleberger,
Blair,	Farley,	Jones of Nevada,	Sabin,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Mahone,	Saulsbury,
Brown,	Gorman,	McMillan,	Sherman,
Butler,	Harris,	McPherson,	Slater,
Camden,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Vance,
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	Pendleton,	Van Wyck,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Pike,	Walker.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think it ought to be stated, in justice to our absent friends as well as to the Senators who are present, that the difficulty in obtaining a quorum arises chiefly from the absence of the Committee on the District of Columbia, one of our largest committees. They are out inspecting the tracks about the city of Washington with reference to a bill providing for the location of a union depot here.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no Senator desires to reserve a separate vote on any amendment, the question will be taken on the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole in gross.

The amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 9 of section 4 I move to strike out all after the world "shall" to the close of that sentence and to insert:

Co-operate with the State and municipal authorities, and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of neat cattle by land or water, in establishing regulations for the safe conveyance of such cattle from the interior to the seaboard, and the shipments thereof, so that such cattle may not be exposed to dangerous, infectious, or communicable diseases, and to prevent the spread of such diseases.

Taking that from the language of the existing statute, which the bill as it stands now repeals. The bill as it now stands repeals the law, which has been twice enacted by Congress, which makes the Secretary of the Treasury co-operate with the municipal authorities or corporations or persons engaged in transportation in reference to the rules and regulations which shall protect the cattle of the country against these dangers of disease.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state to the Senator from Alabama, to save him the necessity of an argument, that I shall not object to the amendment he has proposed. It is the existing statute to-day, and if he wants to insert it here I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Alabama send his amendment to the desk, that it may be reported?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 4 it is proposed to strike out all after the word "shall," in line 9, namely, "from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live-stock as the results of said investigation may require," and to insert in lieu thereof:

Co-operate with State and municipal authorities and corporations and persons engaged in the transportation of neat cattle by land or water in establishing regulations for the safe conveyance of such cattle from the interior to the seaboard and the shipment thereof, so that such cattle may not be exposed to dangerous, infectious, or communicable diseases, and to prevent the spread of such diseases.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 20, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE] on all questions connected with this bill. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. PENDLETON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN]. I would vote for the amendment if he were here.

Mr. SLATER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Bayard,	Groome,	Kenna,	Morgan,
Beck,	Hale,	Lamar,	Ransom,
Call,	Hampton,	Lapham,	Van Wyck.
Coke,	Jones of Florida,	Manderson,
George,	Jones of Nevada,	Maxey,

NAYS—21.

Allison,	Edmunds,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees,
Cameron of Wis.,	Garland,	Morrill,	Williams,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Platt,	Wilson.
Conger,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Cullom,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Dolph,	Miller of Cal.,	Vest,

ABSENT—37.

Aldrich,	Fair,	Jonas,	Sabin,
Anthony,	Farley,	McMillan,	Saulsbury,
Blair,	Frye,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Bowen,	Gibson,	Mahone,	Sherman,

Camden,	Harrison,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Cameron of Pa.,	Hill,	Pike,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Dawes,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President——

Mr. MORGAN. Before the Senator from California offers his amendment, if he will allow me I wish to correct what I suppose to be an inaccuracy in the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Go ahead.

Mr. MORGAN. In line 7 of section 1 I move to strike out "domestic animals" and insert "neat cattle, hogs, and sheep;" so as to read "to investigate and report upon the condition of the neat cattle, hogs, and sheep of the United States."

I suppose that this bill was intended to provide better food for our foreign customers, as well as our own people; but inasmuch as we have got in dogs and other domestic animals, I suppose the committee does not want an investigation as extensive as that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The Committee on Foreign Relations with considerable care prepared a bill, a part of which related to the inspection and quarantine of live cattle imported into this country and a part to the inspection of cattle of this country ready for export, and also to the inspection of meats intended for export from the United States, and have instructed me to offer the substance of that bill in the form of an amendment to the bill now under consideration, which I shall proceed to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment of Mr. MILLER, of California.

Mr. PLUMB. Is there any way to avoid the reading of this measure at length? It has been placed on the table of every Senator, not only in the shape of an amendment but in the shape of a bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I suggest that the reading of it be omitted by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair supposes that all amendments ought to be read before they are acted upon.

Mr. MORGAN. It never has been read.

Mr. PLUMB. Go on.

The Chief Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the amendment, which is to add as additional sections to the bill:

SEC. 12. That the importation of neat cattle, sheep, and other ruminants, and swine, which are diseased or infected with any disease, or which shall have been exposed to such infection within sixty days next before their exportation, is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall knowingly violate the foregoing provision shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, on conviction, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding three years; and any vessel or vehicle used in such unlawful importation shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, at the expense of the owner, to place and retain in quarantine all neat cattle, sheep, and other ruminants, and all swine, imported into the United States, at such ports as he may designate for such purpose, and under such conditions as he may by regulation prescribe, respectively, for the several classes of animals above described; and for this purpose he may have and maintain possession of all lands, buildings, animals, tools, fixtures, and appurtenances now in use for the quarantine of neat cattle, and hereafter purchase, construct, or rent such as may be necessary, and he may appoint veterinary surgeons, inspectors, officers, and employés by him deemed necessary to maintain such quarantine, and provide for the execution of the other provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. That the importation of all animals described in this act into any port in the United States, except such as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury as quarantine stations, is hereby prohibited; and the collector of the port where such animals are landed may cause to be slaughtered such of the animals named in this act as may be, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, adjudged to be infected with any contagious disease, or to have been exposed to infection so as to be dangerous to other animals; and that the value of animals so slaughtered as being so exposed to infection but not infected may be ascertained by the agreement of the collector of such port and owners thereof, if practicable; otherwise, by the appraisal by two persons familiar with the character and value of such property, to be appointed by such collector, whose decision, if they agree, shall be final; otherwise, such collector shall decide between them, and his decision shall be final; and the amount of the value thus ascertained shall be paid to the owner thereof out of money in the Treasury appropriated for the collection of customs; but no payment shall be made for any animal imported in violation of the provisions of this act. If any animals subject to quarantine according to the provisions of this act are brought into any port of the United States where no quarantine station is established, the collector of such port shall require the same to be conveyed by the vessel on which they are imported or are found to the nearest quarantine station at the expense of the owner.

SEC. 15. That whenever, in the opinion of the President, it shall be necessary for the protection of animals in the United States against infectious or contagious diseases, he may, by proclamation, suspend the importation of all or any class of animals for a limited time, and may change, modify, revoke, or renew such proclamation, as the public good may require; and during the time of such suspension the importation of any such animals shall be unlawful.

SEC. 16. That each collector of customs where any of such animals are landed shall cause careful inspection to be made by a suitable officer of all imported animals described in this act, to ascertain whether such animals are infected with contagious diseases or have been exposed to infection so as to be dangerous to other animals, which shall then either be placed in quarantine or dealt with according to the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury; and all food, litter, manure, clothing, utensils, and other appliances that have been so related to such animals on board ship as to be judged liable to convey infection, shall be dealt with according to the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the collector of any port may cause inspection to be made of all animals described in this act intended for exportation, and provide for the disinfection of all vessels engaged in the transportation thereof, and of all barges or other vessels used in the conveyance of such animals intended for export to the ocean steamer or other vessels, and of all attendants and their clothing, and of all head-ropes and other appliances used in such exportation, by such orders and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and if, upon such inspection, any such animals shall be adjudged, under the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury, to be infected or to have been exposed to infection, so as to be dangerous to other animals, they shall not be allowed to be placed upon any vessel for exportation; the expense of all the inspection and disinfection provided for in this section to be borne by the owners of the vessels on which such animals are exported.

SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Treasury may cause to be made a careful inspection of all salted pork and bacon intended for exportation, with a view to ascertain and determine whether the same is wholesome and sound for human food, and may authorize the proper officer of the customs to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such pork and bacon is found; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board salted pork or bacon found, on such inspection, to be unwholesome for human food; but any pork or bacon may be exported to any foreign country without such inspection when it is proven to the satisfaction of the collector of customs that the same has been properly salted and packed more than sixty days prior to the date of the application for inspection or manifest for exportation; and such collector shall in that case certify to the fact that such meat was properly salted and packed more than sixty days before the date of such entry. One copy of any certificate issued by such collector or inspector shall be filed in the custom-house where such inspection is made, another copy shall be attached to the invoice of each separate shipment of such meat, and a third copy shall be delivered to the consignor or shipper of such meat; and as evidence that packages of salted pork and bacon have been inspected in accordance with the provisions of this act, and found to be wholesome and sound for human food, and for the indentification of the same, such marks, stamps, or other devices as the Secretary of the Treasury may by regulation prescribe shall be affixed to each of such packages.

SEC. 18. That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any adulterated or unwholesome food, or vinous, spirituous, or malt liquor adulterated or mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical drug or other ingredient injurious to health. Any person who shall knowingly import into the United States any such adulterated food or drink, knowing or having reason to believe the same to be adulterated, being the owner, or the agent of the owner, or the consignor or consignee of the owner, or in privity with them, assisting in such unlawful act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and liable to prosecution therefor in the district court of the United States for the district into which such property is imported; and, on conviction, such person shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $1,000 for each separate shipment, and may be imprisoned by the court for a term not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court.

SEC. 19. That any article designed for consumption as human food or drink, and any other article of the classes or description mentioned in this act, which shall be imported into the United States contrary to its provisions, shall be forfeited to the United States, and shall be proceeded against under the provisions of chapter 18 of title 13 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and such imported property so declared forfeited may be destroyed or returned to the importer for exportation from the United States, after the payment of all costs and expenses, under such regulation as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury may cause such imported articles to be inspected or examined in order to ascertain whether the same have been so unlawfully imported.

SEC. 20. That whenever the President is satisfied that there is good reason to believe that any importation is being made, or is about to be made, into the United States from any foreign country of any article used for human food or drink that is adulterated to an extent dangerous to the health or welfare of the people of the United States, or any of them, he may issue his proclamation suspending the importation of such articles from such country for such period of time as he may think necessary to prevent such importation; and during such period it shall be unlawful to import into the United States from the countries designated in the proclamation of the President any of the articles the importation of which is so suspended.

SEC. 21. That whenever the President shall be satisfied that unjust discriminations are made by or under the authority of any foreign state against the importation to or sale in such foreign state of any product of the United States, he may direct that such products of such foreign state so discriminating against any product of the United States as he may deem proper shall be excluded from importation to the United States; and in such case he shall make proclamation of his direction in the premises, and therein name the time when such direction against importation shall take effect, and after such date the importation of the articles named in such proclamation shall be unlawful. The President may at any time revoke, modify, terminate, or renew any such direction as, in his opinion, the public interest may require. The foregoing provisions of this section shall expire on the 4th day of March, A. D. 1887, and shall no longer be in force.

Mr. HOAR. The sixteenth section is evidently very crudely prepared. It ends by saying—

The expense of all the inspection and disinfection provided for in this section to be borne by the owners of the vessels on which such animals are exported.

A large part of it is a provision for inspecting animals imported and disinfecting vessels on which they are brought in. Then a large part of the remainder is for examining animals which are not to be permitted to be placed on the vessel. How that inspection is to be paid for solely by charging it to some ship on which some other animals are exported it would be difficult to understand.

Mr. PLUMB. This is undoubtedly a meritorious measure, but it remains to be considered by the Senate. It will undoubtedly provoke an extended discussion. It is not germane to the bill which is pending.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the Senator from Kansas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PLUMB. With pleasure.

Mr. MORGAN. Does he propose to lay this amendment on the table?

Mr. PLUMB. I was thinking of doing so.

Mr. MORGAN. Before he does that I wish to explain my attitude.

Mr. PLUMB. I will not make the motion just now. I was going to do it. I do not desire to embark now upon a new discussion. There are other special orders pending which the Senate desires to take up. This measure ought to have a day in court by itself entirely unimpeded by the existing pending measure, and I shall therefore move to lay upon the table the amendment; but I will withhold that motion for a few moments, in order that the Senator from Alabama may make a short statement in regard to the matter.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I desire to say a word, as I offered the amendment, in explanation. If the Senator from Alabama will allow me now to proceed I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Mr. President, I have offered this amendment, in the first place, because I was instructed to do so by the Committee on Foreign Relations, who have given a great deal of attention to this subject; and second, because I believed that it supplements the bill under consideration in very important particulars. In fact, I regard the first part of this amendment, which relates to the quarantining of cattle imported and intended for export and to the disinfection of vessels, as being of as great importance to the cattle interests of this country, if not greater, than the provisions in the bill under consideration. They relate to the management of the business of the transportation of cattle in the States and the prevention and extirpation of disease in cattle within the States of the Union. This amendment proposes to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle from other countries into the United States, and by carefully prepared provisions it establishes quarantine and gives the power to the officers of the Treasury who have the matter in charge to destroy diseased cattle.

It is quite apparent from the discussion which has taken place here, and from the reports which have been made by the Cattle Commission, and from all the evidence which has been adduced on this subject, that the diseases which are so much feared and dreaded in this country come from foreign countries and chiefly from England. The pleuro-pneumonia and the foot-and-mouth disease are now being introduced into this country chiefly from England. There never has been a case of either of these diseases which has arisen in this country; it has been imported here wholly; and that is the evidence of the officers who have made reports upon the subject.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator explain the point contained in section 21 of the amendment?

Mr. MILLER, of California. That relates to another matter which I will come to presently. That relates to the power of the President to adopt retaliatory measures where other nations have discriminated against the products of this country. I was speaking about the diseases of cattle. Professor Law and Mr. Thayer, in their report as the Cattle Commission, in July, 1883, say:

Up to the present date we have made observations in the stock-yards, the seaports, the terminal point of our cattle traffic, and that to which all infection must gravitate, but apart from the imported cases referred to we have been unable to find a single case of foot-and-mouth disease complained of.

They further say:

After a most extended and almost exhaustive inquiry, your commission have been able to find no trace of foot-and-mouth disease apart from herds which have landed from Great Britain, and which herds have been in every case segregated until the infection has entirely disappeared.

Again they say:

Our connection with the States, as well as the United States, brings us constant complaints of disease supposed to be contagious, but we have not found any evidence of the actual existence of the foot-and-mouth disease at any points among our own herds.

Now, any measure looking to the prevention or extirpation of the foot-and-mouth disease, and other diseases spoken of in this debate, which does not provide against the introduction from Great Britain and other countries of diseased cattle, is a measure which falls short of the purpose for which it is intended. It will be very difficult to show that there has ever been a case of foot-and-mouth disease except on the Atlantic seaboard; and it is certain that there never has been one west of the Alleghany Mountains. In those cases which have appeared on the Atlantic seaboard the disease was brought here; the disease was contracted from animals brought from Great Britain.

I make these general observations to show that this amendment is germane to the question that is under discussion; it is supplemental to the bill; it is as important as the bill itself, and indeed perhaps it is all that is required and all that is needed in the way of legislation on this subject.

Mr. HOAR. At some convenient time in the Senator's remarks I wish he would answer the point I have just made about the section to which I have called attention. It needs some amendment, the Senator will see.

Mr. MILLER, of California. It perhaps may need some amendment. The intention was that the expense of disinfection should be borne by the owners of the vessels disinfected.

Mr. HOAR. But how are you going to enforce this claim? Suppose the man refuses to pay it? A large portion of what is provided is for imported animals and animals that are not permitted to go on the vessel for export. Now, you say that all the expense shall be paid by the vessel on which the animals are exported, when the disinfection of the animals exported may be a very small portion of the expense.

Mr. MILLER, of California. If a vessel requires disinfection after it has brought diseased cattle from Europe, it should pay the expense.

Mr. HOAR. A very small part of what the section provides for is the disinfection of the vessel. It provides for the inspection of the animals.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I am not prepared to say but that a slight amendment there may be necessary.

Mr. HOAR. I do not want to meddle with it, because I have not studied the subject; but the Senator should put a proper amendment in before he has the proposition voted on.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I was about to remark that if there is a very great objection to this amendment the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I certainly share in that opinion—are not particular about its being incorporated on this bill. We regard this as a measure of great importance, even greater than the bill under consideration, and that it is destined to do very much more good to the cattle interest of this country than the bill that it proposes to amend, and we hesitated for some time whether we would desire to incorporate a measure like this, which has been so carefully drawn and carefully considered as this has been, upon such a bill as has been brought here from the House of Representatives. But believing that this measure ought to pass and that it is now very difficult for the House to reach any bill which the Senate may pass at this session, we thought it best to suggest at any rate to the friends of the bill under consideration that we would incorporate this as an amendment, believing that it supplements and improves and rounds out the measure and makes it of some value.

The other branch of it which relates to the inspection of meats intended for exportation, the Senate has had ample opportunity to read and digest and understand, because it was reported some time ago and attracted a great deal of attention when it was reported. I think every Senator is perfectly familiar with the provisions and I think every Senator will agree that some such law as this ought to be enacted.

We have come to the conclusion that the discrimination made against American meats in foreign countries is unwarranted, perhaps based upon a false assumption of facts; at all events that there is no reason for the prohibition of American meats in England and France and the other countries which have prohibited them. The investigation which we have been enabled to give the subject convinced us that the American meats are not infectious, that not a single case of trichina has ever occurred in any part of Europe from the use of American salted meats, that the curing process entirely destroys the parasites. The evidence upon that subject is overwhelming. It is contained in a report which was made by the Committee on Foreign Relations and has been printed. It is voluminous, and contains all the evidence and facts which are necessary to bring any one to that conclusion.

I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate in a discussion of this measure. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] asked me in regard to the twenty-first section as to what was meant by that. We mean precisely this: that the President of the United States shall have the power, as the head of this nation, to issue a proclamation, whenever he thinks the public interest requires it, excluding from importation into the United States any article of commerce from a foreign state which has discriminated against any product of the United States. We believe that although the time may not have come just now for the exercise of such a power, the power ought to be lodged somewhere, to be exercised as occasion may require, so that where willful discriminations are made against the products of the United States without reason, without cause, as we believe they have been and are being made today, the only way to deal with that subject is to place it in the power of the Executive of this nation to adopt similar measures in respect to those nations which discriminate against our products. That is all there is of that.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, the reason why I asked that question of the Senator from California was to have an opportunity to say to him that this matter is entirely too important and too comprehensive, without discussing the merits of it, to be tacked on as an amendment to a bill of this sort. The twenty-first section, of course, brings up all the questions of our foreign relations with France, Germany, England, and all the other nations of Europe. The Committee on Foreign Relations published a volume, which I have read with a great deal of care and with much interest. It has also published another volume for the use of that committee, a copy of which was furnished to me by the kindness of the chairman—perhaps all Senators have not seen it—giving all the tariff laws of the nations of Europe and of all the world, I believe. When this question comes to be discussed it is going, of course, to involve a very careful consideration, and it was for that reason I suggested to him to explain the amendment so that the Senate might see that this was too great a question altogether to attach to a bill that, as I understand it, is simply giving power to the officers of the United States to manage our internal affairs so as to prevent the spread of contagious diseases of animals.

I hope to be heard when the bill comes up on many branches of it, and I did not think we could do it well on the heel of this debate, especially when an important document necessary to the full discussion of the measure has not yet been issued from the committee. They inform us in their report that discriminations have been made against us in very many instances by foreign nations, and that volume I know the Senator from California will furnish at the proper time. It has been published for the use of the committee, but not for the Senate. It is to the magnitude of the question that I desired to call attention, in the hope that the Senator from California would not press the measure now.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I will say to the Senator that there may be much force in what he says. I admit it is a great subject and one that ought to have very careful consideration by the Senate, but it must have the consideration of the Senate before very long.

Mr. BECK. I agree with that.

Mr. MILLER, of California. The measure must be considered, and I thought it might just as well be considered now in connection with this matter, which is cognate to it, which is of a like character, and we have just as much time now to debate the question and consider it as we shall have next week or the week after. Believing that the measure was of great importance to the country and would be productive of immense good and benefit not only to the cattle interests but to our commerce in meats, and also in preventing the introduction into this country of poisonous and adulterated articles of food and drink, I thought we might as well consider it and settle it now.

I did not expect there would be very much objection or opposition to the measure. I cannot see why there should be any opposition to it, particularly on the part of the friends of the bill under consideration. But if the Senate are not disposed to take up this subject and consider it, if they do not want to do anything in regard to the matter, if they want it to go over this Congress so that there will be no legislation on the subject, it is not for me to undertake to force the measure upon the attention of the Senate.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I regret very much——

Mr. MILLER, of California. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, before he proceeds, I wish to make two or three little changes in the amendment. There are one or two verbal amendments needed, and I wish to suggest an amendment to meet the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. PLUMB. Let me suggest to the Senator from California before he proceeds to amend the amendment, that I propose at the proper time to make a motion to lay the amendment on the table in order to test the Senate on the question of consideration. I agreed to withhold the motion in order that the Senator from California might make the statement which he has made, and also that the Senator from Alabama, if he desired, might make some remarks upon the question.

Mr. MILLER, of California. Very well; I will withhold all amendments until that question is determined.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill which is offered by the Senator from California as an amendment to this measure is one of the most important that has been before the Senate since I have been here, and one that is demanded by the condition of the country. It is also demanded by an express resolution of the Senate, which was discussed here for some time and evolved the opinions of a number of Senators, who sent the matter to the Committee on Foreign Relations for full investigation. The resolution was divided into two propositions, upon one of which—the first—the committee was authorized to report without reference to the second. The committee have considered the subject and matured a bill and brought it back, and it will remain for the country to say whether the Senate was "thundering in the index" or whether it really intended to put our products upon such a commercial footing that they would have credit and find purchasers abroad, and also whether it is willing to put the United States Government upon such a footing as will enable us through our Chief Executive to retaliate upon those states that may dishonestly or insincerely exclude our productions upon the false premise that they are unfit for use.

I also in committee, if I am allowed to speak about what occurred in committee, voted to instruct the chairman to offer the bill as an amendment to the pending measure, thinking that there was an entire harmony of view between the promoters of the pending bill and the Committee on Foreign Relations in respect of the rest of the subject, and that this legislation would present a complete body of law, which would cover the entire subject both internally and externally. I have been therefore diligently and honestly endeavoring to try to get the bill before the Senate into a shape where I could conscientiously vote for it. The Senate have deliberately upon votes left in it certain propositions which I can not vote for because I believe they are unconstitutional.

I do not believe that the Congress of the United States have the right to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to regulate the transportation of live-stock at his will and discretion in the United States, and to determine all that is included in that broad proposition. With that out of this crude, unsatisfactory, unprofitable, and unnecessary bill, I would vote to put this important measure from the Committee on Foreign Relations upon it for the purpose of getting the action of the other House upon it at an early day, because the country requires and demands it. It is one of the most serious requirements that can be made upon the Senate of the United States from the commercial people and the agricultural and industrial people of this land.

I regret, therefore, that I shall be compelled to sustain by my vote the motion of the Senator from Kansas to lay this amendment on the table, for I do not wish to be put in a condition when we come to our final vote where I shall be compelled to vote against a measure which I esteem to be one of the most important, beneficially, that the country could possibly have because of the fact that, in my opinion, there is found in the body of the bill to which the amendment is attached an unnecessary provision which is unconstitutional.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. PLUMB. I move that the amendment of the Senator from California lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the amendment proposed by the Senator from California be laid on the table. [Having put the question.] The ayes appear to have it. The ayes have it. The amendment is laid upon the table.

Mr. MILLER, of California. I should like to have the yeas and nays. ["Too late."]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks for the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

Mr. HALE. Is it not too late to ask for the yeas and nays?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is true that the result had been announced, but the Senate is always indulgent in those respects. The present occupant of the chair has never known a case when the yeas and nays were demanded before the Senate proceeded to other business, that the Chair declined to ask whether there was a second to the call. The Senator from California demands the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay on the table. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I only wished to give my reason for the vote I shall cast.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] to lay the amendment on the table, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FARLEY (when his name was called). I am paired upon all questions with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). The Senator from Kentucky who paired me with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] informs me that the Senator from Virginia would vote to table this amendment. As I would do the same, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN].

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). For the moment I forgot that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I do not know how he would vote, and therefore I shall refrain from voting. He was unavoidably called away.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Delaware would vote "yea."

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. PENDLETON. I am paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] except upon this amendment. He would have voted as I shall vote, "nay," against laying the amendment on the table. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Allison,	George,	Lamar,	Pugh,
Beck,	Groome,	McMillan,	Ransom,
Call,	Hale,	Maxey,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	Hampton,	Miller of N. Y.,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Mitchell,	Van Wyck,
Coke,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,	Vest,
Conger,	Jones of Nevada,	Morrill,	Voorhees.
Garland,	Kenna,	Plumb,

NAYS—14.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Williams,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Miller of Cal.,	Wilson.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Pendleton,
Dolph,	Lapham,	Platt,

ABSENT—31.

Anthony,	Cameron of Pa.,	Ingalls,	Riddleberger,
Bayard,	Fair,	Jackson,	Sabin,
Blair,	Farley,	Jonas,	Saulsbury,
Bowen,	Frye,	Logan,	Sherman,
Brown,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Slater,
Butler,	Gorman,	Mahone,	Sewell,
Camden,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Walker.
Colquitt,	Hill,	Pike,

So the amendment was laid on the table.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the bill is now beyond amendment, and I suppose I may speak upon it with more freedom, without the apprehension of designing merely to kill it by any amendment I might choose to move. The bill contains one or two very curious features, to which I wish to call attention.

We have provided in the bill that the Commissioner of Agriculture with his attendants and assistants may make investigations and report of the diseases of domestic animals, and that the transportation of them may be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury. In making his investigations and taking steps to quarantine and to prevent the spread of disease, the bill requires that the Commissioner of Agriculture shall co-operate with the authorities of the States and the Territories. When we came to the question of the transportation of cattle, the Senate refused to have any consultation with the authorities of States or Territories in respect of transportation. But a very remarkable event has taken place, which I think will have some effect, perhaps, upon the destiny of a portion of our country, and that is in regard to the Indian Territory. There is a vast body of country that is not under Territorial organization in the sense of Territorial government, and I take it for granted either that the Indian Territory is not at all provided for in the bill, or, if it is, that we have recognized the legislative power and authority of the tribes who occupy that Territory, and thus, in order to enter there for the purpose of making any investigation or of suppressing disease or anything of that sort, we must consult the authorities of the Indian Territory before we can go in there, so wisely and so splendidly has the bill been knit together.

I should have mentioned this sooner, but I witnessed the fact that the Senate is always impatient of hearing a man who has any objection to make to a pet measure. We are now involved in this category, and perhaps the outcome of it will be something that I would really like very much indeed, and that is that we shall recognize that the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory at least, who have legislatures, who have printing presses, who have printed statutes, who have printed supreme court reports, who have all the appliances of civilized government.

I should like that the Government of the United States would condescend to consult with them upon the question whether its officers should go into their parts of the Indian Territory to ascertain the condition of live-stock as to disease and the like. We have either to put ourselves in the category where we are bound to consult the legislatures in that Territory, or that Territory is a part of the American Union to which this proposed law does not apply. The Senate can determine that question at its leisure, as I suppose it will.

The bill is a crude, imperfect jumble and confusion of contradictory measures and provisions. When the bill is printed, now that it has passed beyond the power of amendment in this body, it will astonish any man on this floor who will read it through to see how utterly confused and contradictory it is. It accomplishes no purposes at all except merely to organize a bureau of animal industry with a few salaried officers. That is all the good it can ever accomplish. The men whom we are to reward at the will and pleasure of the Commissioner of Agriculture will hunt about for causes of disease among cattle and the existence of disease among cattle. They will make themselves very busy to find out that there are diseases in order to justify their employment, and every report that they will make, whether founded upon technical scientific skill or not, whether honest or dishonest, will have a tendency to aggravate the suspicion of the rest of the world in respect of our commerce.

I have not any doubt that we have inflicted upon the stock-growers of this country to-day a loss of probably from thirty to fifty million dollars by the action we take upon this bill. We have sent out through the country a lot of men to herald what they are able to ascertain in respect of the diseases of domestic cattle, whose business it is to hunt up, and whom we reward for the activity that they may exhibit in hunting up a false clamor about our cattle. The same thing has occurred in the Senate two or three times. The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] four years ago, or more, made a speech on the floor of the Senate in which he described the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. I believe he did not then allude to the foot-and-mouth disease in terms, and created an alarm through this country and through England. How much we have suffered by that I do not know. What I do assert, however, is that the Senator from Kentucky in his speeches upon this occasion has informed us that there is not now and never was a case of pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease west of the Alleghany Mountains.

After four years of distressing inquiry and investigation we have now come down to the proposition that there is no cause of complaint in respect of more than nine-tenths of the area of our country, and yet we are legislating in order to create against this great trade of ours the only suspicion that can be engendered against it, for at the very moment we are creating this bureau and paying men to go and find out whether the facts are as stated here or not, and to reverse the opinion expressed in the Senate, the Parliament of Great Britain is publishing in their blue-books that there is no pleuro-pneumonia or foot-and-mouth disease in the United States except that which came from England here and was transplanted from beyond the Atlantic Ocean. They are trying in order to get an opportunity to feed their people at barely living prices with our beef to keep down the very clamor that the Senate is engaged this minute in trying to keep up.

Mr. MAXEY. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I will call his attention to the fact that both the first and second sections of the bill not only include the investigation of cattle but of every domestic animal. Horses, hogs, mules, cattle, everything whatever known under the general designation of live-stock are covered by the bill, and the investigation will be absolutely interminable if carried out according to its terms.

Mr. MORGAN. I had seen that point and moved to strike out those words and to insert "neat cattle, sheep, and hogs." The Senate voted it down. Of course the Senate wanted an investigation into all domestic animals, into every animal wild by nature or otherwise which has been domesticated, whether fit for food or not fit for food. Every description of animal is now included within the purview of the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture. We have spread that department out over all animals that are capable of being diseased that are of a domestic character. That is the attitude in which we stand before the world. Professing to try to protect human food and human health, we go on for the purpose of building up this humbug, for it is nothing else, and we spread this power and jurisdiction broadcast over every domestic animal in the United States.

Then we load down the bill with provisions that are thoroughly unconstitutional. When I say that I speak for my own conscience and my own constituents. I do not speak for anybody else but for myself, for God forbid that I should ever undertake to set myself up in judgment upon another man's construction of the Constitution or his conscience in the interpretation of that instrument. But I would leave this floor never to return to it before I would cast my vote for a bill which placed the entire transportation of the live-stock in the United States under the uncontrolled direction of any man in this Government. That is one power that I did not suppose I should ever be called upon to yield into the hands of another. In doing so I have to lay down the duty which is obligatory upon me as a member of the Senate to enact laws for the control of commerce, and not to abdicate the authority conferred upon me as a Senator by the Constitution into the hands of some other man, not to enact a law but to make his orders as he may please and when he pleases.

That is in this bill, and that is the reason why it was that I was constrained to vote against a measure which is of first and immediate importance to this country when the honorable Senator from California, under the instructions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, brought it forward. I could not vote for the bill after that had been put upon it, and I wanted to vote for that proposition.

This bill will go back to the House of Representatives. It came to us from that body in the most extraordinary shape that any measure ever yet entered the Senate within my observation. I have never before seen anything so crude, so ill-digested. I have never before seen any grasp made of constitutional power in this country equal to this measure. We have tried to amend it. The Senate has done a great deal toward amending it; the Senate has taken much of the vice out of the bill; but I dare say that when we get it into that supreme legislative tribunal known not to our Constitution, and not even to the joint rules of the two Houses, for the Houses have not established joint rules as yet, but known by a sort of common law of courtesy or comity between the two Houses, a conference committee, we shall have a bill doctored into such a shape as may suit the pleasure of that committee.

It is not the legislation as we have amended it here which will pass either House. It will pass this body, I have no doubt, but finally it will not pass either House. The subject will be relegated to that tribunal over which the Senate seems to have no control and seems to have lost all desire to control, and it will come back here not in the shape in which it is now; for when intelligent gentlemen from the Senate and from the other House feel the personal responsibility of the phraseology and arrangement of this bill they will shrink from adopting it in the form that it was sent to us from the House or in the form in which it was amended by the Senate, and they will concoct a measure of their own which will never be read in either House until it has passed both Houses, which will never be the subject of debate, which will never be referred to a committee.

That will be the history of the further progress of this legislation, and this is done on the eve of a Presidential election because gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber, I take it, are afraid to assume the responsibilities which belong to them as Senators in the presence of that great event, which controls every thought in this Chamber almost every day that we live. I confess that I am influenced by it along with other Senators. I try to resist it, with what success I am unable to say. That is the impelling cause; and but for the fact that this is a Presidential year and that that great event is now approaching we should not find the activity upon either side of this Chamber that appears to be manifested here, as I believe, in favor of the passage of a measure which is merely made to flatter a certain portion of our countrymen.

Let me say through the public organs of this body to the farmers of this land, be not deceived by men who would flatter you under temptation. Study thoroughly and deeply the principles of the Constitution of your country and your rights under the Constitution, and do not allow yourselves under circumstances like those that now exist to be persuaded that those are your best friends who choose to place before you or in the hands of your representatives the greatest amount of unjustifiable and unwarrantable power. I hope, sir, to live to see the day when the great farming communities of this country (one of whom, and a noble community it is, I represent, for the people of my State are nine-tenths of them farmers) will assert, as they will do when they think over this matter, the duty of members of both Houses of Congress to confine themselves in their legislation to those things that are prescribed in the charter of our liberties. When they get the moral power to assert this against their representatives, then this country will begin to return to the days in which the Constitution was spoken of with respect, and in which an oath to observe it was considered sacred and binding upon the human heart.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has alluded to me in his speech, and seems to think that I am responsible for all the clamor in the country about pleuro-pneumonia. He says we heard nothing about it until I made a speech four or five years ago in the Senate, and since that time there has been a big scare over the whole country. I am sorry ever to alarm my people in regard to a danger that has not really existed, but believing, as I then did and now do, that there is one most imminent which threatens the destruction of their property, I am glad that I had the opportunity in the Senate of the United States to sound to them so early the tocsin of alarm. I think I demonstrated yesterday fully by the proofs that I adduced that this disease did exist and that it was increasing in the country.

I do not want to enter any further into the discussion of this matter, but wish to say two or three words in relation to the position of the Senator from Alabama upon this question. The burden of all his speeches from the beginning of this discussion has been that we were granting to the Government of the United States and to its officers unreasonable powers, unconstitutional powers, to be exercised at their will and pleasure, in their own interest and to their own advantage, to the detriment of the people of the country.

The amendment which was reported from his committee he has just stated he was in favor of himself, that he thought it a just and a wise measure, and one that ought to be adopted, but he did not want to adopt it as an amendment to this bill because the bill contains provisions which he could not support. His objections to the bill are that it clothes the Secretary of the Treasury, the President, and the Commissioner of Agriculture with powers not warranted by the Constitution for Congress to enact. I voted against tabling the amendment because I wanted to give the Senator from Alabama an opportunity to justify himself upon the Committee on Foreign Relations in offering this amendment to the bill. I wanted to hear him upon both sides of the question. Knowing his reluctance to speak always as I do, I was determined to force him into an argument to sustain that proposition which he admits that he supported in the committee and which he says this moment that he is in favor of now.

What do he and his committee propose in the amendment? What power does he propose to grant the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, and even to lesser officers of the Government of the United States? In section 13, here is the power he proposes to give:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized, at the expense of the owner, to place and retain in quarantine all neat cattle, sheep, and other ruminants, and all swine, imported into the United States, at such ports as he may designate for such purpose, and under such conditions as he may by regulation prescribe, respectively, for the several classes of animals above described.

Section 14 provides:

That the importation of all animals described in this act into any port in the United States, except such as may be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury as quarantine stations, is hereby prohibited; and the collector of the port—

Not only does he give this power to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, but here is a power equally ample that he proposes to give to the collector of customs—and the collector of the port where such animals are landed may cause to be slaughtered such of the animals named in this act as may be, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, adjudged to be infected with any contagious disease, or to have been exposed to infection so as to be dangerous to other animals; and that the value of animals so slaughtered as being so exposed to infection but not infected may be ascertained by the agreement of the collector of such port and owners thereof, if practicable; otherwise, by the appraisal by two persons familiar with the character and value of such property, to be appointed by such collector, whose decision, if they agree, shall be final; otherwise, such collector shall decide between them, and his decision shall be final.

Does not that cover every power and more, too, that is granted in the bill before the Senate? Further on in the proposed amendment section 17 provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may cause to be made a careful inspection of all salted pork and bacon intended for exportation, with a view to ascertain and determine whether the same is wholesome and sound for human food, and may authorize the proper officer of the customs to give an official certificate clearly stating the condition in which such pork and bacon is found; and no clearance shall be given to any vessel having on board salted pork or bacon found, on such inspection, to be unwholesome for human food; but any pork or bacon may be exported to any foreign country without such inspection when it is proven to the satisfaction of the collector of customs that the same has been properly salted and packed more than sixty days prior to the date of the application for inspection or manifest for exportation.

I read these provisions solely for the purpose of showing the consistency of the Senator from Alabama, for in this very amendment which came from his committee and of which he is now in favor forty times the power is proposed to be given to the officers of the Government, and to small ones, even to collectors of customs, than the bill proposes to grant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill pass? Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). On this final vote I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD], who was called away from the Senate Chamber a few minutes ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. BECK'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BECK] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. KENNA (when Mr. CAMDEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. GROOME (when Mr. GORMAN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. GORMAN], who is opposed to the bill, is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN], who favors it.

Mr. PLUMB (when Mr. HARRISON'S name was called.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON]. The Senator from Indiana, if present, would vote "yea" and the Senator from Ohio "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when Mr. JACKSON'S name was called). The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON] is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN].

Mr. KENNA. I announced the pair of my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY]. He is paired on this particular vote with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. PUGH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER].

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]. If my colleague and the Senator from Kentucky were here, my colleague would vote against the bill and the Senator from Kentucky for it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. PLUMB. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PENDLETON] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. BROWN. I am informed that my colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] is paired with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN]. My colleague, if here, would vote against the bill.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that while the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA] has announced correctly the pair of my colleague [Mr. JACKSON] on this bill, I believe he failed to state that my colleague, if here, would vote for the bill and his colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] would vote against it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR]. The Senator from New Jersey is opposed to the bill and the Senator from New Hampshire is in favor of it.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SABIN], who is in favor of the bill, is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who is against it.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. HILL], who is in favor of the bill, is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GIBSON], who is opposed to it.

Mr. ALLISON. In announcing my pair I did not state, as I should have done, that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] would vote against the bill, if present, and I should vote for it.

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Aldrich,	Frye,	Lapham,	Plumb,
Call,	Garland,	Logan,	Sawyer,
Cameron of Wis.,	George,	McMillan,	Van Wyck.
Cockrell,	Hale,	Manderson,	Vest,
Conger,	Harris,	Miller of N. Y.,	Voorhees.
Cullom,	Hawley,	Mitchell,	Williams.
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Wilson.
Dolph,	Kenna,	Pike,
Edmunds,	Lamar,	Platt.

NAYS—9.

Brown,	Groome,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,
Coke,	Hampton,	Maxey,	Ransom.
Farley,

ABSENT—33.

Allison,	Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Saulsbury,
Anthony,	Fair,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Bayard,	Gibson,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Beck,	Gorman,	Miller of Cal.,	Slater,
Blair,	Harrison,	Palmer,	Vance,
Bowen,	Hill,	Pendleton,	Walker.
Butler,	Ingalls,	Pugh,
Camden,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,
Cameron of Pa.,	Jonas,	Sabin,

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say that at the time the vote was taken on laying upon the table the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to the bill that has just passed I was called out, and if I had been here I should have voted for that amendment, and against laying it on the table.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 237) for the relief of John E. Wheelock was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and

The joint resolution (H. Res. 245) authorizing the loan of certain flags to the Portland Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to procure an order for the reprinting of the bankrupt bill as it passed the Senate. I have consulted with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] in regard to it. The copies are entirely exhausted. There has been a large number of applications for it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that it be ordered that the bankruptcy bill be again reprinted as it passed the Senate, the edition having been exhausted. That order will be entered if there be no objection.

AMERICAN SHIPPING.

Mr. FRYE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 1448, to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that a motion is unnecessary, as that bill is an unfinished special order.

Mr. FRYE. I thought so, but several friends of the bill had requested me to make the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair without any motion, if nothing else intervenes, will lay before the Senate the undisposed-of special order, being the bill (S. 1448) to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encourage the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 29, 1884.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. JOHN S. LINDSAY, D. D.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BEACH. I ask unanimous consent that the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The remainder of the Journal was then read, and as read it was approved.

COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations and its subcommittees have leave to sit during the session of the House for the present session.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS FROM THE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask consent to submit for present consideration the resolution I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 31st of May, 1884, after the reading of the Journal, be set apart for the consideration of bills and resolutions reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs, and bills and resolutions on the Speaker's table over which said committee has jurisdiction, the bills and resolutions to be considered in the order the committee may indicate; this order not to interfere with revenue and general appropriation bills and reports from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think I shall have to insist on the bills being named; that I regard as the proper practice, so that the House may know what it is to act upon.

Mr. CASSIDY. The resolution also ought to except all prior orders.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WELLBORN] modify his resolution?

Mr. WELLBORN. To make any modification of it will provoke objection from other sources. The committee ask for only one day.

Mr. BUCKNER. What day?

Mr. WELLBORN. The 31st of May.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. WELLBORN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN RICHMOND.

Mr. STRUBLE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6859) for the relief of John Richmond; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

LETITIA CARR.

Mr. STRUBLE (by request), by unanimous consent, also introduced a bill (H. R. 6860) granting arrears of pension to Letitia Carr, mother of William Carr, late fireman steamer Lioness; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN E. WHEELOCK.

Mr. LAMB. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (H. Res. 237) for the relief of John E. Wheelock be taken from the House Calendar and put upon its passage.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the President be directed to bring to the attention of the Government of Venezuela the claim of John E. Wheelock, a citizen of the United States, for indemnity for gross outrages and tortures inflicted upon him by an officer of said Venezuelan Government, and to demand and enforce, in such manner as he may deem best, an immediate settlement of said claim.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. COX, of New York. Is there a report of a committee on this matter?

Mr. LAMB. There is a unanimous report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, recommending the passage of this joint resolution.

Mr. BEACH. It seems to me this joint resolution should be amended by inserting, before the words "gross outrages" the word "alleged." I hope my friend from Indiana [Mr. LAMB] will consent to this modification.

Mr. LAMB. The Committee on Foreign Affairs examined this question very carefully, and by a unanimous vote directed me to make this report. I do not feel at liberty to consent to any change.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. BEACH. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection; and the joint resolution is before the House for consideration.

Mr. COX, of New York. I hope my friend from Indiana will give us a statement of this case. If it is a case I have in my mind, founded on occurrences in Venezuela, I think the case a very worthy one. But we ought to be a little circumspect in instructing our State Department in regard to matters of this kind. We are legislators, and have no direct connection with the diplomatic communications of the Executive. It is, as I understand, only a moral influence at the very best which we propose to exert in this case.

Mr. LAMB. In 1881, John E. Wheelock, a citizen of the United States, went to Venezuela upon private business. While there he was arrested and imprisoned by an official of the Government of Venezuela, and subjected to tortures almost unheard of in the annals of any civilized government because he would not confess to the commission of an offense with which he was charged. He was tied up by the thumbs, he was hanged by the neck, ropes were tied to his feet and ankles, and he was suspended head downward until he was nearly dead. Almost every torture conceivable to the mind of man was inflicted upon him in order to compel him to make confession of the offense, an alleged larceny. After all this had been done, he was tried—no, not tried, but given a sort of hearing, and was discharged without one word of proof having been offered against him.

The Venezuelan Government from that hour till this has refused to grant Mr. Wheelock any reparation whatever, although from the time of the perpetration of these outrages upon his person he has never ceased to do what was in his power to secure the redress to which he was entitled. The only thing done by the Government of Venezuela has been to drive from its borders the officer who committed these offenses, thereby admitting the charges of Mr. Wheelock to be true.

Mr. Wheelock has exhausted every means in his power, as the report will show, to obtain redress. The State Department has done what it could in his behalf. This joint resolution, unanimously reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, authorizes the President of the United States to act upon this matter in such manner as he may deem proper in order to obtain redress for an outraged citizen of this country and at the same time to defend and uphold the honor and dignity of our Government.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. As I understand, the officer to whom the gentleman has referred made his escape from Venezuela rather than have his conduct investigated.

Mr. LAMB. I think the officer left because he was about to be arrested and prosecuted for the offense.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LAMB moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BARGE PIRATE.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to have taken from the House Calendar and put on its passage the bill (H. R. 4539) to issue American papers to the lighter or barge Pirate, now at New York.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to grant and issue to the lighter or barge Pirate, now lying at New York, an American register or enrollment.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

J. WASHINGTON BRANK.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1132) to place J. Washington Brank on the muster-rolls of Company —, Second North Carolina Mounted Infantry.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE. I will tell the gentleman from Indiana that this will take but a moment. It is for the relief of a soldier; he himself was a soldier and I hope he will not object.

The SPEAKER. The demand for the regular order is in the nature of an objection.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. HERBERT. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withhold his call for a moment to enable me to introduce a joint resolution for reference.

Mr. STEELE. I withdraw the demand for that purpose.

EXCHANGE OF TENTS FOR GATLING GUNS.

Mr. HERBERT, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. Res. 244) authorizing the Secretary of War in his discretion to make exchange of tents for Gatling guns with the National Guard of Alabama; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

LOAN OF FLAGS, BUNTING, ETC.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent to offer a joint resolution for the loan of flags for the fair for the benefit of the Sailors and Soldiers' Monument Association of Maine.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read subject to objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 245) authorizing the loan of certain flags to the Portland Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association.

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Navy, under such conditions as he may deem proper, is hereby authorized to loan to the Portland Soldiers and Sailors' Monument Association, for use at its fair at Portland, Me., in June, 1884, any flags or bunting which can be spared from Kittery navy-yard; the association paying the expense and making good any damages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REED moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WELLER. I demand the regular order.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a moment to offer a resolution setting apart a day for the consideration of business from the Committee on the Militia.

Mr. WELLER. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I ask the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Wednesday, May 22, 1884, be set aside to consider such bills as have been reported from the Committee on the Militia, and be continued from day to day until considered, not to interfere with bills raising revenue, general appropriation bills, or previous orders.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that bills from the Committee on Public Lands should also be excepted.

Mr. CASSIDY. All prior orders.

Mr. RANDALL. I will object to that.

Mr. COX, of North Carolina. I have no objection to modifying the resolution as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from Nevada.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution as modified?

Mr. RANDALL and Mr. WELLER objected.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with the morning hour for the call of committees.

Mr. WASHBURN. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will give way to permit me to offer a resolution reported from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well; I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. WASHBURN. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to ask unanimous consent to introduce for immediate consideration the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The title of the joint resolution will be read, after which objection will be asked for.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution appropriating $10,000 to defray the expenses attending the visit of the special embassy from Siam to the United States.

The joint resolution was read at length.

Mr. WELLER. I renew the demand for the regular order.

Mr. MORRISON. I move to dispense with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. That requires a vote of two-thirds.

The motion to dispense with the morning hour was agreed to—two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House do now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider revenue bills.

The motion was agreed to.

TARIFF BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. COX, of New York, in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in committee for the further consideration of the bill to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Mr. Chairman, the present customs laid upon imported goods have been characterized by the so-called revenue reformers as a system of legalized robbery of their consumers, and their ingenuity has been taxed to the utmost to invent fitting phrase by which to describe the criminal extortions they have exacted from the poor for the benefit of the rich manufacturing monopolies, as they have been pleased to style those industries of our country wherein are invested near three billions of capital and which afford labor to 4,000,000 workers and support to nearly one-third of the population of the United States. The charge is made that these 4,000,000 workers, with their wives and children, amounting to 8,000,000 more, are supported by a taxation imposed upon that other great industrial class, those engaged in agriculture. In all the States and in all the communities where manufactures and agriculture both thrive the two classes are intermixed and alike in race, religion, language, social habits, and are entirely ignorant, the one that it is robbed by the other, the one that it robs the other; ignorant of that, as is asserted by political charlatans, a great system of spoliation is now maintained of the one class for the benefit of the other; and we find it, sir, the purpose of a great political party, that has failed after an ineffectual struggle of twenty-three years to gain public confidence and political power, now organizing upon this platform and making the effort to antagonize these two great industrial classes and force a division of parties upon a line between them, to arouse political strife where none now exists; for I am not aware they so far have divided against each other upon a political line, and whenever they shall, evil consequences only can result.

I shall not devote any portion of my time to demonstrating that the protective system of the last twenty-two years has been of great benefit to the capital invested in manufacture, and of great benefit to the labor engaged in the industries; that it has given a remunerative profit upon the capital, and more constant and remunerative employment to the workers, has not been disputed. I am aware instances have been cited where some new industries have yielded capital an excessive profit, but it has now become a recognized fact that through the labor organizations the wages of the operatives are so adjusted to the profits of the business that labor and capital each receive their equitable proportion, and no longer can the capitalist be charged with robbing the consumer; if there is any robbery it is alike the capitalist and the craftsman. And I shall not attempt to discuss those questions of political economy upon which so much has been said and written by political demagogues and statesmen; they are only bewildering and unsatisfactory.

We have so long maintained the protective system that it can be fairly judged by its results to all classes, both to the mechanic and to the agriculturist, both to the American producer and the American consumer; and if I fail of demonstrating the policy has been of equal advantage to the agriculturists and to capital invested in and workers engaged in the manufacturing industries I will gladly join with my free-trade friends. I do not believe any more than they that one industry should be supported at the expense of another. The argument is constantly made, in fact it is the only one upon which the "revenue reformers" rely, that the tax collected upon all those articles in common use among the farmers to that extent enhances their price, and is a direct tax upon the farmers and for which the farmer receives no corresponding benefit. And, sir, I shall undertake to establish that those taxes do not so increase the price, but that they do increase the value of every known agricultural product, and that while they increase the wages of labor of the farm-worker they more than compensate the farmer in the increased value of his products.

We have passed out of the period for speculation upon this great question or for assertion. The year 1860 substantially closed, as compared with our present system, the period of free trade or of a tariff for revenue only; and soon thereafter commenced our present protective policy, and we have tested it for more than twenty years and can now fairly compare the present condition as its results with what we find existed in 1860—the close, as I have said, of the free-trade era. I think, sir, I have heard some one here in this discussion assert it was impracticable to make such a comparison; others I have heard maintain that such a comparison demonstrated that agriculture was not as flourishing or profitable now as then. To all these gentlemen I reply, you have gone to the discussion of this matter without investigation; you have depended, like the gentleman from Texas, who asserted the agricultural products of 1860 were greater in value than those of 1880, upon secondary evidence, when a little more labor, a little research, would have shown you all such assertions are untrue.

Census returns have been appealed to and their tabulations paraded. Well, sir, I propose to examine them for a little while and draw some comparisons between what they exhibit for 1860 and 1880, the close of the two periods. I propose to contrast

PRODUCTION OF 1860 WITH 1880.

Statistics, sir, are edged-tools in the hands of the inexpert or the indolent, and these absurd statements have been made on the authority of census tabulations, from no fault of the census results, but from ignorance of what they are intended to mean. In the first place, the main tables include only the productions of farms, without any reference to ranches on public lands or the products of lots in towns or villages. Further, they exclude all pasturage and the dry forage of all the cereals, which now aggregate 127,000,000 acres. They exclude a variety of minor products of agriculture, which have never been embraced in the schedules. They therefore exclude all that goes into the production of meat except about half the corn crop and a small portion of the hay. None of the cereals except corn are to be considered in meat production.

In 1860 the "value of animals slaughtered or sold for slaughter" appears in the census as $213,618,692. In 1880 the value of meats of all kinds is excluded from the tabulations of farm returns, because they are obtained by special expert investigation and not by the regular enumerators. As the actual value of meats in 1880 was three to four times as much, $800,000,000, the absence of this item makes a wide difference in the comparison. The poultry product in 1860 was $50,000,000; in 1880 it was $150,000,000.

PRODUCTION IN 1860 AND 1880 COMPARED.

The enlargement of production since 1860 from the increase of agricultural machinery, from the stimulus to home consumption by extension of manufactures, and greater ability to consume largely through high wages of labor, is a wonder to Americans as well as to the world at large, and from some of the statements made on this floor it would seem to be unknown to several participants in this discussion.

The increase in farms and farm areas from 1860 to 1880 is as follows:

	1860.	1880.
Number	2,044,077	4,008,907
Acres improved	163,110,720	284,771,042
Total acres	407,212,538	536,081,835

Production was increased in far greater ratio than farms or acreage. Corn advanced from a product of 838,792,742 to 1,754,591,676, or 109 per cent.; wheat, from 173,104,924 to 459,483,137 bushels, or 165 per cent.; all cereals taken together, from 1,239,039,439 to 2,697,580,229 bushels, or 118 per cent. Cotton, in 1860, had reached an unprecedented production with a rapidity that had been phenomenal. The crop of 1859 amounted to 4,669,770 bales. Though its cultivation almost ceased for four years, it had risen to 5,761,252 bales in 1879, and to 6,949,756 in 1882.

Fifty years ago 60 per cent. of our agricultural exports was cotton. Now, while it is nine times as much in value, it constitutes only a third of the values of agricultural exports. In the same time the increase in value of meat and breadstuffs has been thirty-fold. The exports of cotton were very heavy in 1859–'60, amounting to $191,806,555 in value, but in 1883 the value was $247,328,721, though the consumption of cotton in American manufactories was enlarged in still greater proportion, from 422,704,975 to 750,343,981 pounds, with very rapid increase since 1880. In the same period the increase of exports of agricultural products was from $256,560,972 to $619,269,449.

The product of wool is four times as much as in 1860 (it was 241,000,000 pounds in 1880), of improved quality, making the strongest and most durable cloth of any manufacturing country in the world, and needing no admixture of foreign wools. In 1860 we imported half the woolen goods consumed in cloth and in wool. Now we produce about four-fifths of the consumption, and the small proportion imported is largely carpet wools of too low a grade for civilized agriculture to produce. It is true that there is a small quantity of superfine wool introduced, ours being principally of medium fineness.

The production of meat has been enlarged beyond the increase of numbers of cattle or the increment of population to be fed. Recent investigation in the Department of Agriculture has made the increase of value of cattle, by improvements in breeding upon the original stock, the sum of $287,000,000. The cattle exported from New York in 1881 averaged $93.65 and those from Boston $99.68, being mostly high-grade short-horns, while the unimproved Spanish cattle exported from Florida averaged but $14.09 and those from Texas but $16.84. The cattle exported in 1860 averaged only $38.26 per head, while the exportation of 1881 averaged $77.93 per head.

The price also indicates the great improvement in quality, as well as the stimulus of increased home consumption supplemented by the enlarged foreign demand. The Chicago prices of beeves in 1860 ranged from $1.90 to $3.75 per hundred; in 1882 extra beeves reached $6.85 per hundred.

The exports of animals in their products was in 1860 but $20,402,812. In 1881 it was $175,584,760.

And now, sir, I propose to make a comparison of values and prices. In comparing the values of products of 1860 with those of 1880 the influence of railway extension and industrial prosperity are shown in their effect on prices. It is seen that prices of many products were high in 1860 on the seaboard and low in the interior. In December of 1860 oats in New York were 37 cents per bushel; in Chicago 17 cents. Corn was 68 cents in New York; in Chicago 27 cents. Wheat was $1.35 in New York; in Chicago 75 cents.

In 1880 the aggregate value of the products of agriculture was more than double the aggregate for 1860. The comparative values of some of the principal products are as follows:

Products.	1860.	1880.	1882.
Cereals	$558,345,836	$1,329,930,517	$1,468,693,393
Cotton	211,516,625	271,636,121	309,696,500
Hay	152,671,168	410,146,545	369,958,158
Potatoes	44,459,547	81,848,474	95,304,844
Tobacco	21,710,473	38,758,215	43,189,951
Total	988,703,649	2,132,319,872	2,286,842,846

I invite the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to these figures. I doubt if he will be content to let his statements stand; and I say to the gentleman he has but to investigate the census returns, examine them, to verify my statement—give to the investigation some labor and that honesty of purpose that distinguish him and he will verify my figures. And this is a matter over which there should be no dispute and in which there should certainly be no dishonesty. I am sure none is intended.

Now, sir, I want to call attention to farm prices in 1860, 1880, and 1882. I think, sir, I have heard it said we could not obtain them; and now bear in mind it is not the seaboard price which is to control—it includes transportation from the farm—but the price at the market point to the producer must be taken. I have worked this out at the cost of considerable labor, and I challenge its examination. If any one will take the prices current, at the nearest market in the various producing sections, of the various products, he will reach the same results; and while my average is lower than at some favored points, he will find the prices for the different years will at the same points bear usually the same comparative relations to each other, and this must be remembered in the comparison of prices which I shall make:

Average farm values of agricultural products in 1860, 1880, and 1882, respectively.

Cereals.	1860.	1880.	1882.
Wheat, per bushel	$0 72.0	$0 95.1	$0 88.2
Corn, per bushel	43.0	39.6	48.4
Oats, per bushel	25.0	36.0	37.5
Rye, per bushel	52.0	75.6	61.5
Buckwheat, per bushel	58.0	59.4	72.9
Barley, per bushel	55.0	66.6	62.8
Potatoes, per bushel	40.0	48.3	55.7
Tobacco, per pound	05.0	08.2	08.4
Cotton, per pound	09.3	09.8	09.9
Hay, per ton	8 00.0	11 65.0	9 70.0

And sir, I want to call the special attention of my friend Mr. MILLS to a production which I fear he has left out of his calculation. Perhaps he thought it inconsequential, but it is too large an interest, has become so, not to have attention. I refer to the

BUTTER AND CHEESE PRODUCTION.

The butter production of farms, as reported by the census of 1860, was 459,681,372 pounds. Inclusive of that, not entering into the farm enumeration, the entire product of the United States was about 500,000,000 pounds. In 1880 the amount returned from farms and factories was 806,672,071. The total product of the country was about 900,000,000 pounds.

The average price of butter exported in 1860 was 15 cents. As only the poorer qualities were exported the average farm price is a little higher than the seaboard price of export butter, and I estimate it at 16 cents. The range of recent prices is from 9 to 40 on the farm, with much higher rates for a small quantity of "gilt-edged" samples, yet the average is still low, but is not less than 21 cents for 1880 and 22 cents for 1882.

The export price in these years respectively was 17.1 and 18½ cents per pound.

The production of cheese advanced from 103,663,927 pounds in 1860 to 243,157,850 in 1880. Including a little unenumerated, the actual production would be about 130,000,000 and 300,000,000 respectively.

The average prices were about 9½ cents in 1860, 9¼ in 1880, and 10½ in 1882. There was a partial glut in 1880, which reduced the price. The export prices of cheese are a little higher than farm prices—10 cents in 1860, 9½ cents in 1880, and 11.2 in 1882.

As a rule prices of butter are much higher in recent years than twenty-five years ago. Cheese is now about 10 per cent. higher, as an average.

The value of all productions of agriculture for 1879, exclusive of about $400,000,000 of corn and hay consumed in the production of meat, was, approximately, $3,600,000,000. This includes all meat products, milk consumed, fruit, and various minor products not included in the census tabulation of 1880. Of this about $400,000,000 (farm value) was exported, leaving $3,200,000,000 for domestic consumption. This gives about 11 per cent. for exportation, which is more than usual, the range of recent years being 8 to 10 per cent.

In 1859 the production aggregated a value of about $1,600,000,000, of which nearly $200,000,000 was exported, leaving for home consumption a value of $1,400,000,000. The per capita value of this consumption is nearly $45 in 1860 against $65 in 1880.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I invite the closest examination of the figures I have presented, and they prove, sir, an enormous increase in our farm production and an advancement of price. And this brings me to the question, Who consumes them? Who pays for them? Whose demand makes these prices? And it will be borne in mind only 89 per cent. of them are consumed here, and there are some very pertinent facts to which I invite attention in this connection.

CONSUMPTION BY CLASSES OF OCCUPATIONS.

A statement of occupations of the American people by classes of industries shows that the proportion in agriculture is declining, the number engaged in rural industries being 47.35 per cent. in 1870 and 44.1 per cent. in 1880. The other classes have increased accordingly. This is a favorable indication, as not more than 30 per cent. of the workers of a nation as rich in resources of production as ours are necessary to produce a supply for home consumption.

Occupation.	1870.		1880.
	Number.	Per ct.	Number.	Per ct.
Agriculture	5,922,471	47.55	7,670,493	44.2
Professional and personal	2,684,793	21.47	4,074,238	23.4
Trade and transportation	1,191,238	9.53	1,810,256	10.4
Manufactures	2,707,421	21.65	3,837,112	22.1
Total occupations	12,505,923		17,392,099
Total population	38,925,598		50,155,783

As the numbers reported in occupations do not include the female head of the family or children or infirm persons, each individual represents nearly three persons, the whole number being 17,392,099 in a population of 50,155,783, the persons represented in each class may therefore be stated as follows:

In agriculture	22,118,700
In manufactures and mining	11,084,428
In trade and transportation	5,216,202
In professional and personal services	11,736,453

Two-thirds of all are engaged in productive material industries. About one-tenth, those in trade and transportation, are employed in exchanges and distribution. The remainder, in domestic service, in unskilled labor, and also those included in the professions, are connected with or dependent upon manufactures, mining, and commerce, and only to a limited extent on agriculture, as farm laborers are included in the principal class of occupations. Distributing this class, therefore, among the others, and allowing for the transportation service caused by the presence of manufactures, the proportion of the population dependent on manufactures and mining may fairly be considered one-third of all; but to come within very conservative bounds we will only claim three-tenths. With a probable consumption at present values of three and a third billions of dollars, the consumption due to manufactures and mining is not less than $1,000,000,000 in the primitive values of the farm, which are materially increased by the profits of the merchants and compensation of the carriers before reaching the consumers. This is a sum equivalent to more than half the agricultural production of the country in 1860.

A transfer of a small proportion of the labor which this industrial population represents—a population now of not less than 17,000,000—to the cultivation of the soil would cause a disastrous glut in the agricultural supply, a ruinous fall in prices, and a commercial revulsion and general depression of values frightful to contemplate.

Already have we reached a point where greater diversity in agricultural production is a vital necessity of American agriculture. Already are we verging constantly on an unprofitable degree of overproduction.

Need I say more to demonstrate the dependence of the farmer upon the other great industries fostered by our laws? It gives them a market practically at their farms, certainly greatly lessens the cost of transportation, for that is shortened to the near village or not far distant city where manufacture thrives; and that near market enables them to diversify agriculture, produce its more varied and valuable fruits. Lands nearest those markets are the more valuable, because products of greater value can be sold, and which the cost of a long transportation with its delays and the cost and delays in sale at a distant market render unremunerative. Without it, where are they to market the fruits of their labor and capital? An overproduction, every one knows, lowers the prices, and now they produce 11 per cent. more than the country can consume. In Europe—abroad; is that the answer? Well, I will come to that by and by; but first let me a little further illustrate by comparison the effect of our tariff upon the farmers. And I say, sir, with great pleasure, I belong to them by ancestry, by birth, and breeding, and my sympathy, yes, my prejudices, would not allow of a word or a vote on my part against their interests.

VALUE PER FARMER.

The average value of production of each farmer was much greater in 1880 than in 1860, notwithstanding the fact that the average size of farms had decreased from 199 acres to 134, and the number of farmers had increased from 2,509,456 to 4,225,945. Including values of farm products which are not duplicated in meat production, the proportion of each farmer was $638 in 1860 and $852 in 1880.

The value of farms, live-stock, and implements representing the permanent investment in agriculture made an aggregate of $7,980,493,063 in 1860, and in 1880 a total of $12,104,001,538.

So far, what I have said has been more directly addressed to the interest of the farmer, and I do not wish to lose sight of the fact that while the farmer, the proprietor, has had these benefits from our present system, is so dependent upon it, his laborers have shared proportionately with him. There are 3,323,876 of them.

And now a word as to the WAGES OF FARM LABOR.

The wages of farm labor fifty years ago were estimated by experts to average $9 per month with board. The rise was slow until 1860. With the development of other industries competition for labor increased the rate of wages. The rate of wages paid wholly in cash twenty-five years ago averaged about $14 per month. The rise was rapid during the war, and in 1867 reached an average of $26, but declined with the appreciation of the currency to gold values, and still more from the effect of the period of monetary depression, and reached its minimum in 1879. The last investigation made by the Department of Agriculture in 1882, when labor was in a normal condition and currency equal in value to gold, was $18.58. An increase of fully 40 per cent. has been made since the rise of the manufacturing system.

The differences in local rates illustrate the influence of an industrial population in the midst of an agricultural district in a very striking manner. In Northern Ohio, where Cleveland and Toledo and other cities compete for labor in various industries, the average value in 1882 was $25.96 per month; in the western counties, with Cincinnati and Columbus, Dayton and Springfield, agricultural wages average $24.75. In the more exclusively agricultural counties of Eastern Ohio the average is $22.65. By such a sliding scale is the rate diminished as a penalty for lack of industrial variety.

Comparing the State of Ohio with Kentucky the decline is more abrupt, from $24.55 to $18.20.

Illinois, like Ohio, has a sliding scale just in proportion to the numbers of workers outside of rival industry in northern, central, and southern districts, from $27.52 to $24.65 and $19.87.

It was found in these investigations that in the period of manufacturing depression the wages of agricultural labor declined most in the manufacturing States, and ultimately reduced the wages of farm laborers in agricultural States. The assertion has often been recklessly made that operatives and artisans thrown out of employment do not seek agricultural labor, but these official investigations prove incontestibly the contrary, and show that the effect is serious and far-reaching. The average rate of wages in Massachusetts in 1879 was $25 and $30.66 in 1882. In New Hampshire the increase was from $19.75 to $25.25. So with other manufacturing States.

And in this connection I will call attention to the decrease in price and yet improvement in actual value in those implements of husbandry in use among agricultural workers, grass-mowers and grain-reapers, wagons, and others. And, sir, I believe I can confidently appeal to the recollection of the farmer that, taking into account quality, the prices will average 25 per cent. less now than in 1860. And this has been the result of a system of protection which, guaranteeing a home market, invited capital, organized labor, and educated it to the highest excellence, stimulated invention, and produced competition in these productions and those labor-saving machines, enabling the farmer, while he pays higher wages for labor, to employ far less to accomplish far greater results. And hence it is that we are able to show a larger production at the same cost now than we were 1860.

I have promised to again refer to the great question of what the American farmer shall do with his surplus, and whether he can safely depend upon a foreign market for it. And I propose to present a few facts in regard to the wheat production of the world and the possibilities, yes, probabilities of that production, and leave it to those who hear or read what I say to judge if a foreign market can be depended upon.

The United States now stands at the head of the wheat-producing nations of the world. Until 1874 France held the first rank. The wheat area has nearly doubled since the ninth decennial census was taken. The product of the last seven years has averaged 436,000,000 bushels. The production has increased from 100,000,000 bushels in 1849 to 504,000,000 bushels, and the per capita supply from four and a third to nine and a half bushels. One-third of the production has for six years been exported.

This was very well in years of failure and threatened famine in Western Europe. But in 1882 the usual average of 1,143,826,044 bushels was increased to 1,270,000,000. The surplus of this country was estimated at 48,000,000 bushels. India produced an excessive crop. Australasia had an enlarged product, and Egypt, Algiers, the Argentine Republic, and Chili helped to swell the supply of the world. During the entire year past the visible stocks have everywhere been increasing.

What are we doing? Simply co-operating with Great Britain in her extraordinary endeavors to reduce the price of wheat, to sustain free trade by giving cheap bread for the sustenance of low-priced labor. To this end she is building railroads in India and promoting railroad extension through the Dominion of Canada to the Pacific, and seeking to control the destinies of Egypt and other nationalities.

The effect of this overproduction is seen in a disastrous fall in the price of wheat below a remunerative basis.

The average product of wheat in British India, as given by Sir Evelyn Baring, the finance minister, was 700 pounds, or 11⅔ bushels per acre; and the acreage 21,000,000, making a product of 245,000,000 bushels. A recent official estimate makes the product of 1883 (harvested in March) 190,000,000 bushels for British India and 50,000,000 bushels for the product of native territory.

The unoccupied cultivable land in the principal provinces is officially estimated at 182,069 square miles, of which 83,600 square miles are in provinces, where 25 per cent. of cultivated area is in wheat. It is therefore possible that the area might be increased 12,000,000 to 15,000,000 acres, and with increase in native districts it is not impossible to double the present area.

Increase of railroad facilities would render available at once a larger proportion of the present production and stimulate somewhat the extension of area. The mileage in March, 1883, was 10,251, and an increase of 7 per cent. is calculated for the present year.

The exports of India in the fiscal year ended March, 1873, amounted to 3,277,781, and in 1882 37,148,543 bushels. In seven months of the past year the shipments had reached 31,027,074 bushels, fully 50 per cent. more than had ever been shipped in the same period of any previous year. The exports of five years, from 1879 to 1883, averaged 16,786,265 bushels. So the increase of ten years has been in rapidly accelerating ratio.

In Australia the present wheat crop is more than double that of 1883. The increase in South Australia, according to recent estimates, is from 7,356,117 bushels to 20,900,000, and in Victoria from 8,751,454 to 17,400,000 bushels. The value of wheat in Australia is from 3*s.* to 3*s.* 6*d.* per bushel, or 80 cents per bushel. In New Zealand the farmers are discarding primitive and exhaustive wheat growing, importing fertilizers and agricultural machinery. The average yield in 1882 was nearly twenty-three bushels per acre.

The progress of agriculture in the Argentine Republic is at present very rapid. Much of the soil is a deep, black mold, very productive. There is a strong movement from pastoral to general agriculture, toward inclosure of pastoral areas and the practice of mixed husbandry. The average export value of Russian wheat from 1873 to 1880 was $1.01 per bushel. The quantity exported was 475,000,000 bushels, or an average of 59,375,000 per annum. And, confronting these startling facts, are we to be told Western Europe will take our surplus and that we can safely destroy our manufacturing industries and change their operatives to producers from being consumers?

I have shown you that 30 per cent. engaged in agriculture will supply themselves and the balance of the population, and that we now have 44 per cent.—14 per cent. above the required number now—and we have a large overproduction. Take but 10 per cent. from manufactures, 270,742—the present production per capita in agriculture is about $400—and the result is an increase of our present surplus of $108,296,800.

Seriously, I ask gentlemen on the other side, would you make this an agricultural country? Then please give us some of the results from your standpoint. If we were all farmers, all producers of farm products; if we had been, say, for the last twenty-five years, and both the emigration to this country and the natural increase of the population had gone to the land for support, what price would these products now bring, and where would they market them?

And, Mr. Chairman, now I come to the humorous, ridiculous, or deceptive illustrations, depending upon the talent of the inventor, to convince the farmer that he is being robbed in the high price he is compelled to pay for the articles he consumes, and Mr. Sidney Smith's (I think he was the author) story of taxation has been dished up in a hundred different forms, and with countless variations, to illustrate the exactions and robberies of our present tariff system.

Gentlemen have forgotten that while agriculture has made the advance I have described so have the other industries, and with this prosperity knowledge has been disseminated, education has been extended, the press has prospered, books have been written, the census has been taken, statistics published, and thought quickened, deepened, and broadened with all the people—at least, sir, with all the people I have much knowledge of in this country; certainly in all those communities where the twin and dependent industries farming and manufacturing both thrive without jealousies, and where thrift is the rule they have grown rich. The people have grown rich—not the few, as I will soon show, but all the people—and property has brought knowledge and education, dispelled prejudice and ignorance, and you face an audience that will trip you if you make a single mistake.

I propose to make a comparison of prices for 1860 with those of 1880 of those goods farmers consume, and you will bear in mind I have taken my prices from an Eastern market, to which for other sections transportation should be added, and, unless I made the exception, the retailer's profit, and I assume this profit and transportation to be the same for both years.

In 1860 John and James Dobson, of Philadelphia, and for several years prior and subsequent to that year, were among the largest manufacturers of blankets and woolen goods in the United States. From their books of original entry I am furnished the following list of average prices for blankets during the years 1858, 1859, and 1860 compared with the average prices prevailing in 1882 and 1883 for like quality:

1860..... $2.00, $2.50, $2.25 , $3.50, $3.75, $5.00, $7.50, $8.00, $10.00, $13.00
1883..... $1.25, $1.80, $1.62½, $2.35, $3.20, $3.75, $5.50, $5.60, $7.25, $8.50

The above includes the entire line of white blankets from the lowest to the best grades per pair, standard make of what are known as plain Norway blankets. The figures show a decline of 30 per cent. to 60 per cent. in favor of the present protective system over the "for-revenue-only" or free-trade system that prevailed prior to 1861.

The wool used in the manufacture of these blankets is about 6 per cent. below the average price in 1860. All wools are based in valuation on Ohio fine fleece, which in 1860 was worth 45 cents per pound, and which is worth now 42 cents per pound. Blanket wools are of lower quality, but have the same relative value. Their books show "coarse woolen fabrics carry out the same relative rates as blankets, particularly goods used for overcoats. These were worth in 1860 $1.50 per yard. The same goods are sold to-day for 80 cents to $1 per yard. In the entire range of woolens used for wear of men and women the same relative difference exists, the present prices being from 30 to 60 per cent. below those prevailing in 1860."

How is it in reference to carpets? From 1857 to 1860, both years inclusive, the average price per yard of five-frame English body brussels carpet in England was 4*s.* 10*d.*, equivalent to $1.10 of our money. The same class and quality of carpets of American manufacture are to-day selling for $1.07 cash. Tapestry brussels carpets sold in 1860 at 75 cents per yard, and are sold here to-day at 67 cents for like quality. Standard make of American ingrain carpets sold in 1857–1860 at 75 to 80 cents per yard, and are now sold at 60 to 67 cents.

And I here give another list of comparative prices of 1860 with 1884, which will be very instructive to those who claim our protective policy has not cheapened woolen goods. The prices are taken from an account of goods of like quality actually sold:

Let us examine the prices of cotton goods under the revenue tariff of 1857 and the protective tariff of 1861 and subsequent years. I have here a table of prices for sheetings and shirtings, prepared by the firm of Richardson, Smith & Co , and taken from their books of original entry, and which show a difference of from 20 to 30 per cent. in favor of present prices. Here are the figures, those for 1860 being the average prices per yard for that year and those for 1884 being the average prices per yard for March, 1884:

Under the tariff of 1857 the duty on ordinary white crockery-ware was 24 per cent. ad valorem. Prior to March last the duty was 40 per cent. In 1860 a crate of crockery-ware was sold, including duty, for $95.30. In 1882 a crate of this same ware, including the increased duty of 16 per cent., was sold for $57.89; a difference of $37.41, which difference is owing to the establishment and successful prosecution of this industry in this country.

How is it with boots and shoes? These necessary articles of wear are not only better now in quality and more varied in variety than in 1860, but prices are lower than during the period from 1857 to 1860. Here is a table showing the prices prevailing in January, 1860, and January, 1884.

I desire to dwell a little longer upon woolen goods, they enter so largely into consumption and are in so general use. In no department of manufacture, I concede, is there such a difficulty of making a comparison of prices at different periods as in the woolen manufacture, on account of the differences of style, finish, and raw material of the fabrics from year to year. I have confronted all this in my investigations. The only article forming a proper standard of comparison is flannel, which is the basis of all card-wool cloths. In a report made to the Syracuse convention in 1871 the following statement was made by the secretary of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers:

Reliable returns from the two leading agencies in the country, representing more than twenty different establishments manufacturing flannels, show that the selling prices of flannels in September, 1869, two years after the passage of the tariff of 1867, were in one house 21 per cent., and in another 16 per cent. less in gold than in 1860. On the other hand, the books of a mill producing cloths more and of greater variety than any other establishment in the country, and employing 2,500 operatives, show an advance in wages in gold from September, 1860, to September, 1869, of 37 per cent. for female operatives and 50 per cent. for male operatives. The secretary of the Wool Manufacturers' Association in his annual report in October, 1880, says:

"The present year affords us the first opportunity for many years of making an exact comparison with the prices of 1860, since our currency is of the same value as at that period.

"Those most familiar with the markets estimate that ordinary woolen goods, constituting the great bulk of consumption, are now obtained by consumers from 12½ to 25 per cent. less than goods of the same quality could be purchased before the war. To be more specific, ingrain carpets, the principal article of consumption in this class, was sold at 12½ per cent. more in April, 1860, than in April, 1879, with wool about the same, but an increased cost of labor in the same period. I am authorized to state that dress goods selling in 1860 for 20 cents per yard are now, in 1880, selling for 15 cents per yard, a saving of 25 per cent.; that the saving to American consumers in the product of five mills in New England making dress goods of an annual value of $10,000,000 is $2,500,000, and this too with higher prices of wool to the farmer and better wages to the operatives."

Since 1880 the reduction of cost in dress goods to consumers has gone on with accelerated ratio. I have in my hands a return from the Pacific Mills, the largest mill for producing this style of goods in this country, which is as follows:

I give you below the average net prices obtained for our worsted goods for the period of six months, ending—

	Cents per yard.
May 31, 1872	20.06
May 31, 1877	16.82
May 31, 1880	15.43
May 31, 1881	14.52
May 31, 1882	11.22

Since 1882 the goods made have been of higher quality than the above, and the prices obtained have averaged a little more, though really a little lower in proportion to cost.

A statement from another mill manufacturing woolen fabrics proper, the oldest and one of the most extensive establishments, shows the greatest reduction of prices to consumers under the operation of a protective tariff. This statement, be it remembered, was not prepared for the use to which I apply it in this debate.

The difficulty of comparing the prices of 1860 and 1880 is enhanced by the circumstance that the records of many of the mills in New England for 1860 were destroyed by the great fire in Boston in 1872. Mr. Horace Greeley's work on political economy, however, contains a statement of the prices of the most important woolen fabrics of 1859.

At my request, a gentleman skilled in woolen manufacture has added to Mr. Greeley's list of prices for 1859 the prices, obtained from manufacturers or selling agents, of the identical goods named, the prices at the present time. The prices for 1884 were furnished by the well-known houses and individuals Parker, Wilder & Co., Faulkner, Page & Co., J. B. Bradlie, J. D. Sturtevant, Wendell, Fay & Co., of Boston. In respect to a portion of the goods described in Mr. Greeley's list it may be observed that no corresponding goods of the manufacture of the present year could be found.

"The prices of the most important woolen fabrics ten years ago, 1859 (when we had comparative free trade in wool and woolens), and now," says Mr. Greeley, "are as follows, namely." I add to his column the prices in 1884:

a These goods are improved in quality.
b The Ballard Vale flannels are exceptionally fine goods, the chief cost of which is labor, and are slightly advanced because of the advance in wages of labor.

The above statement is entitled to more consideration because it was not prepared by manufacturers to suit a purpose. It is all the more reliable because of the moderate reduction it shows, and because an increase in price in some cases is stated. It shows upon the whole a substantial reduction, and this in face of the fact that the wages of labor have increased, as is declared, 15 to 20 per cent. Upon the whole there has been considerable reduction to the consumer, although the duties upon all the articles have been more than doubled by the successive tariffs of 1861, 1863, and 1867; so that this table furnishes a complete refutation of the free-trade assertion that the prices of goods are enhanced to consumers in proportion to the increase of the duties.

As to finished cloths not included in the above list, such as fancy cassimeres, of which the great bulk of clothing goods is composed, it should be observed that only a few of the old mills continue to make cloths identical with those made before 1860. I have, however, samples from two such mills which illustrate the general reduction of prices in this class of goods. They are:

Articles.	1860.	1884.
	Per yd.	Per yd.
Fitchburg all-wool cassimeres, 27 inches wide, wholesale price	$1 05	$0 92
Haile & Frost cassimeres, 27 inches wide, average wholesale price	51	42

Enthusiasts for protection may be disappointed that its friends can adduce no more startling illustrations of the effect of protective duties in reducing prices; but it must be remembered that the manufacture of the fabrics last referred to was firmly established years before 1860, and after the first effects of the introduction of a new fabric in reducing prices the further reduction is slow and gradual. The most striking effect of protective duties is seen in the introduction of new fabrics. The invariable effect of such an introduction by domestic manufacture of an article formerly obtained only abroad is invariably to reduce prices. Thus, delaines at their first introduction in about 1840 cost from 30 to 40 cents. They soon fell to 20 cents. Lawns, introduced in 1846, cost 27 cents. In a few years they fell to 9 and 10 cents. Kerseys, introduced in 1851, cost $2. In twelve months afterward they fell to $1.25. The introduction of lastings diminished the price one-third; that of buntings more than one-half. French moquette carpets cost, when first introduced here about fifteen years ago, from $2.50 to $3.50 per yard according to quality. The American manufacture, commenced shortly after, reduced the price to $1.45 per yard, while American machinery, stimulated by our tariffs, introduced abroad, has diminished the price in all manufacturing countries of the world.

Refined bar-iron is used to make wagon-tires, horseshoes, agricultural implements, and many other articles in which the farmer has direct interest. I insert a table showing a lower value for the last five years than for the five years ending with 1860. [See table marked A.]

I shall not present comparative tables of the values of all the iron and steel goods for the two periods—these metals are largely used in the machines and implements which have been largely reduced in price since 1860, the fashions have not changed in iron and steel goods so as to make comparison difficult—but I will take for comparison the material of which they are made, and upon which the duties are alike imposed. An examination of the prices of No. 1 anthracite foundery pig-iron shows that it is lower now than from 1855 to 1860 inclusive. [See table on opposite page.]

It will be sufficient now if I make comparison of prices of a few articles in such universal use, and unchangeable in character, that will be recognized by every farmer. I invite attention to them. I give the wholesale prices in an Eastern market, to which transportation to suit other points and the retailer's profits must be added. A reduction is the rule, and without an exception. Nails, in 1860, sold at $3.10 to $3.50 per hundred pounds, to-day at $2.40 per hundred pounds; Yankee axes, in 1860, at $10.75 per dozen, to-day the same goods sell at $7.25 per dozen, manufacturers' prices at both periods.

After an exhaustive examination, I assert that the iron and steel used by farmers, in whatever form used, into whatever machine, tool, or implement fashioned, costs from 10 to 20 per cent. less now than in 1860. For like quality of goods the average reduction is more than 12 per cent.; in many of the prominent articles it is 20 per cent.

There is one more article of consumption I must mention, glass. The taxation of the poor man's window-glass that gave him heaven's light has been so often glowingly dwelt upon that it deserves a passing notice. I have time to take but one quality or grade, but that illustrates the whole list.

According to the best data attainable, plate-glass cost the consumers of the United States, prior to the Morrill tariff of 1861, about $1.50 per square foot; from passage of this bill to establishment of factories in the United States the price was about $2.50 per square foot. The price at present is about 80 cents per square foot. And you will please remember that no part of this large reduction is due either to improved methods or improved machinery, but solely to sharp competition of American factories.

In 1882 there were in round figures 3,050,000 square feet of polished plate-glass imported into this country. This glass, at prices ruling before the Morrill bill, would cost $4,575,000; before the competition of American factories, $7,625,000; now, $2,440,000.

The difference is very large; and bear in mind that the difference above shown is but for one year, and to multiply it by 10 will give a fair idea of the amount saved to the consumers of our country by home competition in plate-glass. To go more into details, the treasurer of one of the American factories has in his possession the books of a firm of glass dealers doing business from 1863 to 1870. I compare herewith prices per square foot then and now:

1863–'70	$3 05	$2 26	$1 66	$3 39	$3 26	$2 09	$2 07
Now	93	95	76	1 04	97	73	92
1863–'70	1 68	1 98	2 11	3 67	2 62	1 74	1 88
Now	93	97	88	1 07	97	94	69

Please also bear in mind that prices named from 1863–'70 were the prices the firm of glass dealers paid for its goods. The prices named for the present are present prices to consumers, and for comparison from 20 per cent. to 30 per cent. should be added to the prices of 1863–'70 to cover freights, insurance, profits, &c.

The reduction in the price of certain lines of goods can not better be illustrated than by the statement of facts appearing in the report of our foreign commerce. In the fiscal year ending June, 1883, we exported and sold abroad:

Wood, and manufactures of	$20,996,304
Iron and steel, manufactures of	19,240,894
Manufactures of cotton	12,951,145
Leather, and manufactures of	7,923,662
Agricultural implements	3,883,919
An aggregate of	64,995,924

Without my going into detail, all who hear me and who read what I may say will understand the above exportations include and are made up substantially of those articles of which farmers and farm laborers are the great consumers and of a large portion the only consumers. How, then, does the tariff advance the price to them, since by American competition, American thrift, energy, and ingenuity, our people undersell their foreign competitors outside of the jurisdiction of our tariff laws in foreign markets?

It is a well-known fact that as to very many lines of goods, and especially in those consumed by the agricultural and laboring classes, we do not need protection, and the articles might properly be placed upon the free-list; and except for the great difficulty in drawing statutes which will describe and observe the distinctions, and for the further reason the present laws do no actual harm, would be. I have said the laws imposing customs upon goods we export do no harm. A tariff debate does not justify that remark, since participants in it will attempt to prove that burdens are imposed by our system of protection by asserting the price of certain goods are increased thereby, when they must know we manufacture those goods for the markets of the world and successfully compete with the foreign manufactures; and thus they furnish another illustration of the dishonesty that will be resorted to in order to gain a political advantage.

But the question is suggested: why these great reductions in price? And I will answer: for the five years ending with 1860 we bought goods largely abroad and paid for them from our agricultural products, but we did not export enough to pay for what we bought; the balance was against us in amount $133,616,201. The accumulated property of the country was going out of the country at the rate of from $20,000,000 to $50,000,000 each year. We did not raise enough annually to pay our annual cost of living. As a people we were growing poorer and poorer every day; and we had no home competition in goods we bought. We paid the price the foreign market put upon them, interest was high, and we did not have a competitive home market.

Mr. HERBERT. Permit me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. HERBERT. If goods, say crockery, have not fallen more rapidly there than here, why is it that in the last revision it was necessary to raise the duty on crockery-ware?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will come to that in a moment and completely answer the question.

Mr. HERBERT. I hope you will not forget it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I will not; and I hope the gentleman will not forget to study the suggestive schedules I will publish with my remarks.

The Republican party came into power and enacted our present protective laws commencing with 1861, and subsequently those laws insured a home market for American goods, and we bought at home; the money ceased to flow out of the country to pay our debts abroad, and in the last eight years of this protective policy we have accumulated $1,307,229,276 of yearly balances in our favor. Europe has contributed this great volume of wealth to us. To this for the eight years add the gold and silver product of the country, amounting to $80,000,000 annually, and which we have not been compelled to export to settle yearly balances in trade against us; the money is in the country; we have had it as a people for use. The rate of interest grew lower year by year; the average reduction throughout the country has been 25 per cent. of the rate in 1860. This capital sought investment, was employed in manufactures, it organized labor; home competition educated men in new and more economical methods and processes of manufacture; it extended railroads, discovered and developed new coal-fields and copper and iron ore beds; caused sharp competition in what my colleague would call raw material, and cheapened it all. It was a sturdy contest among our own people for support, property, and the life of their industries, respectively, and prices slowly but surely fell, and yet the industries were fairly prosperous. The saving in the cost was what lowered the prices.

We are told in this connection that the rich have grown richer and we have created monopolies. I assert that all have grown richer, and that competition as a result has been extended. I have already exhibited the increase to the farmer; the laborers have grown richer, and I mention to you that in 1883 the savings-bank deposits were $1,024,856,787; and these deposits are in States or localities where manufacture is side by side with agriculture. The savings-bank deposits of New York are $500,000,000; and this immense volume of capital is seeking investment at 5 per cent. upon the dollar per annum or less. It is a fact that the young farmer usually starts out with a mortgage upon his farm, and in the savings-bank centers he pays this low rate of interest, and in 1860 he paid 7 per cent. or more. I am now speaking of the East. The rates for both periods are higher West, but there is this corresponding difference between the two years.

But I am asked, why maintain the tariff if prices of goods are lower than in 1860, and if I claim if we reduced it there would not be a reduction in price? I do not claim there would not be a reduction in price temporarily. If we make a reduction in duty the surplus goods of other countries would be thrown upon us, and their manufacturing industries would be stimulated and our own industries would struggle for a while against it and the market would grow lower here. Our manufacturers in the end would be ruined, would yield to inevitable bankruptcy, our home market for our agricultural products would be impaired, the foreign producers would take the field and in time adjust their production and exportation to our market to the consumption and control it, and prices would advance above the present rates.

Such has been the history of the past. I for one believe that an absolutely protective tariff upon all goods in which there can not be a monopoly in the long run would be for the advantage of our people; for we accumulate wealth here very fast in the production of the fruits of the earth and the products of our mines, and that wealth would be poured into manufacture and we would have that competition here which would make very low prices; but the theory upon which we impose customs is to protect the American producer, and yet constantly force from him the lowest living prices, lest he be undersold with foreign goods and thus make a competition between the two. I am content with it. But the avowed purpose of the impending bill is to disturb this policy, break it down; and that the majority of the committee did not go further is due, as I understand it, to the fact they thought they could not accomplish more now.

In reply to the gentleman from Alabama in regard to crockery, we reduced the duty upon the common ware. Upon fine goods, namely, those decorated, and that fairly may be classed as luxuries, we increased the duties, to invite capital to develop their manufacture here, and with success, and the result of the competition has been to force down their price both here and abroad.

And it is said the revenues must be reduced. Who can tell us this bill will reduce the revenues? That is all a pretext, and gentlemen know it. There is a sure and certain way to reduce revenues. You can remove the internal-revenue tax from tobacco, and thus reduce the revenues $25,000,000; and I assert this tax is levied directly upon the poor, the article is consumed by them—it is the men of wealth who buy the imported article—and they will have it, and there is no pretense that the tax limits the consumption, or that the consumption should be limited by it more than of tea and coffee and many other articles in constant, universal use.

You may pass a law removing the tax from all distilled spirits used in manufacturing or in chemical combination that will not permit of its use as a beverage. I think I understood my colleague the other day to admit I had pressed the consideration of this question upon the Committee on Ways and Means. While you can not get at it very accurately, I believe this would reduce the revenue $30,000,000 a year, and by reducing the cost of the distilled spirits thus used would promote a still further consumption in those ways and extend the consumption of grain from which they are made, extend the market, and in the uses I have indicated the tax adds to the cost of useful and necessary articles of consumption by all classes. The tax is a tax upon the consumer. I would not remove the tax so far as it is imposed upon distilled spirits or the products of them consumed as a beverage; but there is no difficulty in formulating a law that will observe the distinction, and continue the tax upon the beverage in every form.

But, sir, the authors of this measure do not care to reduce taxes. They want an issue for the next Presidential campaign which is so near. I doubt if they want this bill passed before then in both Houses of Congress; they want it pending.

The product of our manufactures is annually five and one-half billions of dollars, the annual production of the non-precious minerals entering into manufacture is nearly one hundred and fifty millions. The chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and his party associates have declared war upon and propose to destroy this property, bankrupt its possessors, and pauperize the millions that it now pays the wages of labor to, wages of labor that support families, that educate the young, and give homes and the comforts and pleasures of life to more than twelve millions of our people. These gentlemen would impoverish those homes, pauperize the families, rear the children in ignorance—and poverty and ignorance are the parents of crime and vice; thrifty, intelligent communities they would convert into the vicious, beggarly, ignorant, brutal, and criminal classes of the manufacturing and mining districts of the Old World. And can they convince an intelligent man they can accomplish this result, and that other classes will remain uninjured, will not share the bankruptcy, the poverty, the ignorance, and the degradation? The American people are homogeneous, and the degradation of a family injures its neighbors, however diverse their occupations. And if you degrade nearly one-third of all our people the others will share it. Morality, Christianity, and patriotism protest against the inhumanity. I have shown you that the interest of the other classes and of the country is opposed to this war of destruction. Sir, if successful, it will change our social system, introduce class distinctions into the country, and in the end will revolutionize our Government practically, if not in form. Gentlemen on the other side are constantly mourning over our tendency to centralization of power and to a strong government. Whenever the wages of labor shall be so regulated as to give but an animal support to the worker, then you must have a strong government, with its army of police; and if you would force the country upon that period you have but to impoverish the craftsman and the workingman by reducing their wages of labor by this 20 per cent. reduction.

Our country has a climate as varied and power of production as diversified, and I do not know but as great, as that of all Europe. It includes thirty-eight States, and vast Territories, each as rich in resources as a powerful state in Europe, all connected by abundant water or railroad communication. Our internal commerce exceeds that of any other continent. This they would impair, if not destroy; would neglect our own resources, destroy our home market, bankrupt our capitalists, and impoverish our people to add to the wealth of the foreign manufacturer; it may be to the advantage also of their workmen. I will concede that, but self-preservation is the first law to be observed by nations as well as by individuals, and that law is involved in your policy and purpose.

I have stated the issue fairly.

This issue has been tendered to us by the other side. With a unanimity which is certainly gratifying to me, we have accepted it upon this side of the House. You propose to tender it to the people in November next. The Republican party, I doubt not, proposes to accept the issue. You must remember that in all your localities where the hum of machinery is heard it will drown your eloquence, and where the light of the forge and of the blast-furnace is seen it will let light in upon your reasoning. I am willing for one to submit it to an audience of agricultural people, as we shall be compelled to do; and, sir, I for one shall rest content with their verdict. [Loud applause.]

I will print with my remarks a table of the products of agriculture for 1859 and 1879, the two census years that afford the basis of my comparisons, with the letter of Professor Dodge, the Statistician of the Bureau of Agriculture, who prepared the table at my request. His eminent ability, perfect fairness, and complete knowledge of the subject no one will question. I have but this to add: the same elements and calculations enter into the results for both years, and for any increase or diminution of product for one year there must be a corresponding increase or diminution for the other, and the comparative difference between the two years will remain, and remain also in the comparisons I have made.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., April 28, 1884.

SIR: In response to your inquiry for the values of the products of agriculture of the years 1859 and 1879, respectively, including what is reported by the census and also estimates of farm production unreported and products of public lands and village lots as well, I respectfully submit the following statement:

[For table by Professor Dodge, see opposite page.]

This tabulation includes the items returned by the farm enumerators of the eighth and tenth censuses. It also adds, for both periods, the estimated production of poultry and eggs, the milk consumed, and butter and cheese made on ranches and in villages and towns as well as on farms. It gives the estimated production of meats in 1880 to correspond with the returns of such products in 1860.

In addition to all these products the list is still incomplete, and should include the annual increase or "betterment" of farm stock, exclusive of animals slaughtered, and a great variety of minor products, such as cotton-seed, the castor bean, broom-corn, various millets used as grains, volatile oils, &c.

Pasturage is not mentioned in the census, because it enters into the meat product. Nor is the stover and straw of more than a hundred million acres of grain. Of the products named above less than half the corn and a small part of the hay is duplicated in the meats, and a portion of that is offset by the unenumerated rough fodder which goes to the support of horses, mules, and working oxen, which should properly be counted in the values of products.

In brief, taking everything into consideration, I make the net value of all agricultural production on farms, ranches, and in town and village lots, in round numbers, $1,600,000,000 for the crop-year 1859, returned by the census in 1860, and $3,600,000,000 for the year 1879. As to the items, though not quite complete or absolutely beyond any necessary revision, no possible review could materially change essentially the comparison of the two periods.

I may be permitted to say that I had charge of the collection of the agricultural statistics of the tenth census and of the annual crop returns of the Department of Agriculture for a large portion of the period between 1860 and 1880, and that I know of no one else who has ever made special study of this subject. It should be remembered that no census has ever yet included all production in its schedules, and that no two agree in their list of products reported. As to values, the returns were notoriously incomplete, and from the difficulty and complexity of the subject must necessarily have been, the true results being only obtainable by tests of quantities returned and their values in average farm prices.

Respectfully,

J. R. DODGE, Statistician.

To Hon. FRANK HISCOCK.

Mr. Chairman, I shall print also with my remarks matter not new to the committee, and I shall not trouble it with it—extracts from reports made by Professor Dodge, which so fully illustrate the views I have expressed that I am constrained to give them such circulation as these remarks of mine shall have. They are as follows:

It was shown conclusively, by figures of the census of 1880, that increase of non-agricultural population enhances prices of lands and farm products. There was found a relation, other things being equal, of such prices to relative numbers of agriculturists and other workers. The larger the proportion of farmers, the smaller were found values in agriculture. Now, in view of the above considerations of nearness of producers to consumers, it is important to know whether, within the States, the proximity of different classes of workers increases locally such prices. It would be reasonable to suppose it would.

To test the supposition, by the figures of the census which show the value of the products of manufacture, which represent usually the largest element in non-agricultural industry, let us take the principal manufacturing counties, average the value of their farm lands, and compare the result with the average value of all the remaining farm lands within the State.

There is a great difference in the aggregate value of manufactures of the different States. Mississippi and Nevada have no county with $1,000,000 worth of manufactured products. Massachusetts has only two with less than $10,000,000, and has one with $134,567,625. Therefore it is necessary, in a comparison between the principal manufacturing counties and those of less importance, to take a different minimum of value in Alabama, as a line of separation, from the minimum taken in Massachusetts. The minimum proposed for each of the States south of Pennsylvania and the Ohio River is $1,000,000. Each county having not less than that amount of value in manufacturing production is placed in a group, and the average value of their lands compared with the average value of all the remaining lands in the State.

Then the agricultural States, in which other industries are more important, are allowed a minimum of $2,000,000 per county. In this group come the thriving Northwestern States, new and largely agricultural, yet progressive, and already diversifying their industries, rural and manufacturing, quite rapidly. They are Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa, and California is classed with them.

Then come the four States of the Ohio Basin, which lie between the river and the great lakes, which are already prominent in industrial development. It is necessary to make $5,000,000 the minimum, so general is the distribution of the industries. With Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois are placed the States of Northern New England, namely Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont.

In a fourth group, comprising each of the Middle States, having a larger industrial development, $10,000,000 per county will make a fair exhibit of the more advanced industrial counties.

These for groups comprise all the States, except those in Southern New England, which have a very exceptional degree of industrial advancement. In these Connecticut has three of her eight counties with more than $25,000,000 each. In Massachusetts and Rhode Island the minimum is fixed at $50,000,000.

The result of this comparison shows in every State, without exception, a higher average value of farm land in that portion of each State which makes the largest value of the products of manufacturing industry. These two sections of each State are contrasted in the following statement, which also gives the totals for each State, as follows:

The reader will observe that in every State there is a difference in value of lands in favor of the manufacturing counties, and that where there is little manufacturing there is small difference, and where the products of manufacture are of large value lands bear a high price. That this differentiation may be easily seen the following classification is made:

VARIATION BY STATES AND GROUPS.

These States aggregate the value of $5,336,465,954 in products of manufactures, the grand aggregate in 1880 being $5,369,579,191 for all the States and Territories of the United States. Now, the eighteen States and one Territory in the group which has the least manufactures produce a value of $676,427,860, or 12.6 per cent. of the total for the United States, a fraction of 1 per cent. for each State. These may well be considered agricultural States.

The third group includes four States, also essentially agricultural—Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, and California—in which there is a quite general determination not to remain in the category of one-idea communities in industrial development. They have $391,585,577 in manufacturing production, or 7.3 per cent. of the grand aggregate for the whole country.

The second group is rounding into symmetry in industry and realizing the benefits of such a status in high prices of lands and farm products, and rapid increase in wealth and culture. This class includes the States north of the Ohio River—Ohio, Michigan, Indiana, and Illinois—and also Northern New England. These seven States return a production of $1,247,046,686, which is 23.2 per cent. of the whole. These may be deemed industrial as well as agricultural.

But there are seven other States in which the industries are more equally balanced than any other, which make more than half the industrial production of the United States, worth $3,021,405,831, or 56.3 of all. These are found in Southern New England and the Middle States, and may properly be grouped together.

They include all manufacturing production except six-tenths of 1 per cent., scattered through two States and nine Territories. The tabulation by States is as follows:

Aggregate value of products of agriculture by States, acres of land in farms, and value of farm lands, by States and groups of States.

THE FARMER'S INCOME.

The fact that the group of States where industry is most diversified (those having only 18 per cent. of all workers engaged in agriculture) afford $457 per annum to each one, while the agricultural States, having 77 per cent. in agriculture, allow an annual income of only $160, is too significant to be explained away, too convincing for pretense of cavil. It stands as proof of the necessity of symmetry and completeness of the productive system, and as a forceful illustration of the solidarity of the industries.

Full acceptance of the truth that increase of non-agricultural workers enhances values in agriculture, as proven by this grouping of facts, has been nearly universal.

2. It increases the value of production. In the early days of the infancy of our manufactures, within the recollection of persons of middle age, wheat has been sold for less than 40 cents per bushel. There was a surplus for which there was little demand, because nearly every head of a family produced his own supply. Sixty years ago the price of our wheat exports at the place of shipment was but 70 cents per bushel, and it required eighty-eight bushels of that wheat to pay for a ton of pig-iron imported the same year. Last year twenty-five bushels of wheat would pay for a ton of pig-iron of our own manufacture, and yet we are told that farmers are ruined by the tariff on iron. The reason of this great difference is found in the fact that between four and five million tons of pig-iron are now made annually in the United States, or more than ten times as much as was produced in Great Britain sixty years ago, and more than was made there in any year prior to 1863.

Take a notable example of the crushing weight of overproduction upon price. Not many years ago, when cotton was worth 23 cents per pound, the planting returns disclosed the fact, in June, that one-third increase in area had been made. I at once predicted that with a season favoring an average yield per acre the price of middling cotton would in six months fall to 15 cents. The increase was more than a million bales and the average price of the crop was a fraction less than 15 cents, and brought to the growers $45,000,000 less than the smaller previous crop. They realized, too, that all of their extra labor had been thrown away, besides a heavy loss in addition. With no money-producing crop but cotton and no employment for idle labor in other productive industry, it is not strange that discouragement was disheartening and poverty imminent.

Again recurring to unpublished results of the census of 1880, a striking illustration of the influences of manufactures on the profits of agriculture is presented. The census returns the value of the products of agriculture reported on its schedules. Comparing the average value of production for each person (farmer or farm laborer) engaged in rural industry, we have $431 for Pennsylvania, and $180 for Virginia; $394 for Ohio, and $199 for Kentucky; $467 in Illinois, and $376 in Minnesota. Dividing again the States and Territories into four sections, the first comprising the manufacturing and mining areas, and including all having a smaller proportion than 30 per cent. of the occupied population, the working class, engaged in agricultural employments; the second section comprising all States having more than 30 and under 50 per cent.; the third including all States having 50 and not exceeding 70 per cent., and the fourth including all States having more than 70 per cent. engaged in agriculture, we have the following perfectly natural, not to say inevitable, results, namely:

Classes.	Engaged in agriculture.	Products of agriculture.	Value per capita.	Workers in agriculture.
	Number.	Dollars.	Dolls.	Per ct.
First class	1,060,681	484,770,797	457	16.59
Second class	1,566,875	616,850 959	394	40.12
Third class	3,017,971	786,681,420	261	58.85
Fourth class	2,024,966	325,099.388	161	77.46

Here again we see the product per man go down as the percentage of agricultural workers goes up. We see that in the manufacturing States 1,060,681 agriculturists get $484,770,797 per annum for their labor, while in the agricultural States 2,024,966 receive only $325,099,388. New Jersey has but 14.92 per cent. in agriculture, and each man earns $501, while Mississippi has 81.81 per cent., the largest proportion of any State, and each person earns but $187, the lowest average in the United States.

As with the price of land so with the value of the products of the soil. As the proportion of agricultural to other labor goes up, falls the value of a farm laborer's production by a regular, steep, inevitable gradation. The States with less than 30 per cent. in farm labor realize nearly three times as much per man as those which have over 70 per cent. in farm work. In other words, one man in the first class realizes as much as the three men who are competing with each other, having little outlet for surplus production. Three brothers in Alabama, laboring through the year, get as much for their aggregate produce as one farmer receives in Pennsylvania, simply becausethat farmer has a brother engaged in manufacture and another in mining. It is because in one case there is a market for one product only, thousands of miles away; in the other, there are markets at every door.

The same state of facts was shown in 1870, and similar differences will illustrate the value of diversified labor in 1890.

Mr. HURD. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MORSE].

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose in this debate to consider questions not legitimately raised by the pending bill, but to confine myself to matters which naturally come up and are necessarily to be considered in determining the vote to be cast finally for or against tariff reduction. My first duty as a Representative, it seems to me, is to inquire into the condition of the Treasury and the requirements of the Government for the next fiscal year, and then to do what I can to prevent the collec-tion of more money than is necessary to meet those requirements.

It is admitted on all sides that under our present system of taxation we are collecting about $100,000,000 a year in excess of what is required to carry on the Federal Government, administered as it has been for years on a basis of extreme liberality, to say the least.

Now, the surplus revenue is dangerous in many ways. In the first place, it is a wrong done to the people of the United States to withdraw from the ordinary business of the country the sum of $100,000,000, and to hoard it up in the Treasury of the United States, to lie there idle, when it might be usefully employed in conjunction with the labor now unemployed in developing the resources of the country, while the indirect taxation, the amount of which is uncertain and unknown, and which can never go for the public good, but only for the increase of private profits, is a greater wrong, because it is both unlawful and unmeasurable.

It is an unlawful burden imposed upon the tax-payers who have long borne heavy burdens of taxation and borne them uncomplainingly, because they seemed to be required by the necessities of the Government and the people. And it is not only unjust so far as the tax-payers are concerned, but the evil seems still greater when we remember the influence of so large an amount of money in exciting legislation in favor of unnecessary objects. When revenue is collected equal only to the necessities of the Government it is carefully husbanded and only appropriated for the purposes which are legitimate and proper; but when it is so large in amount legislators are tempted to expend it upon schemes which are neither national, legitimate, nor in anyway conducive to the public welfare, but on the contrary lead to extravagance and thence to corruption, for one follows the other as surely as night follows day.

Niebuhr, the philosophic German historian, as the result of his studies said that "the sting of taxation consists in wastefulness." To save ourselves from any such danger the safe course to pursue is to collect only the needed amount of revenue. Suppose the city government of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Saint Louis, or any other large city should collect one million more for one year than would be required to pay its necessary expenses; how long would that administration remain in power? Only until the next election took place, when they would be hurled out of power, as we ought to be if we do not at this time vote to adjust the income of the Government to its necessities.

It is unfortunate that this vital question should be embarrassed by the excitements and passions of a Presidential campaign, but we can not change the inevitable; and now that the issue is presented to us by a solemn vote of the House it is our sworn duty to do the best that the circumstances by which we are surrounded will permit. Whatever responsibility may be incurred by others for neglecting to do a plain and pressing duty, we can not shirk or thrust aside what is incumbent upon us to do quickly at this time.

Now, sir, I am not a free-trader, because the time has not yet come for free trade, although by the advance of all nations in economic knowledge I believe the day is not far distant when it will be adopted, if not altogether at least to a great extent, in this country. Nor am I a protectionist, because in my judgment the necessity for a protective policy no longer exists here, as our successful industries are undoubtedly able to cope with and win victories over the industries of other countries if we could have free raw materials to begin with.

I listened very carefully to the speech delivered by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] who has made the tariff question a study for a quarter of a century, and who undoubtedly is as well informed and as honest and earnest as any man can be. If I understand him, as he stated his case, he gives his own country no credit for what has been produced from our soil, nor for our skilled labor and improved machinery, but claims that our whole prosperity is the result of protective tariffs. To that I take exception. He might as well give credit to the "Greenbackers," who sought to make the country rich by unlimited paper-money legislation, as to make our people believe that acts of Congress in favor of high tariffs are the cause of our agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial prosperity.

The truth is, all values have for their basis labor and capital, one acting upon the other, and each dependent one upon the other. If I were urged to state what I believe to be the proper platform for just and safe action at this time, I would suggest the following:

The reduction of taxation by limiting the national income to the ordinary expenses of the Government; the cessation of silver coinage for at least two years; the passage of a national bankrupt law, which every merchant whose trade is large enough to reach beyond the limits of his own State will approve; give the country free ships, free coal, free lumber, free potatoes, free sugar—in fact, free raw materials; satisfy the people that you believe in civil-service reform by your acts; show them that you are opposed to the spoils system.

This ought to be the cheapest country in the world in which to live, instead of which it is admitted that it is the dearest. I commenced business in Boston in 1850, when I boarded at the old Bromfield House at $4.50 per week, room and all. The same living would cost me to-day $24.50. That may be charged to the credit of a protective tariff system. I rented a place of business in 1859 in Dock Square, Boston, and paid $2,000 rent per annum. I remained there long enough to pay $6,600 per annum. That may be credited to the protective tariff. The first year I went there I paid $372 taxes per year on that store, while the last year I paid $1,000 on the same store. That may be credited to the protective tariff. I simply make this statement to show how ridiculous the argument seems to me as a business man that the whole prosperity of this country is due to a protective tariff. I deny that it is.

Had the report of the Tariff Commission, Mr. Chairman, been enacted into a law as it was originally presented to this House there might not be to-day any necessity for further action on this question; and for that reason I do not like the present bill, because it does not go far enough in general reduction. I would have it go so far as to settle the question for at least ten years to come. Had the committee left the bill as originally agreed upon, with a larger free-list, it would have satisfied me much better than the present measure does. In fact, I believe in putting all raw materials upon the free-list. With such a provision added to this bill, no further legislation on the tariff question would probably be required for another decade. What is feared, and justly, is the continued agitation of the tariff question. What we want is a more settled policy.

I clearly see the difficulty in the way. Here comes Ohio asking that the duty on wool shall be restored, and members of both parties from that State vote for it, and are ready to go home and say they did it all and simply for the reason that they believe they could thereby carry the election in that State. It reminds me a good deal of the action of the California delegation in reference to the Chinese immigration several years ago.. Each party in the delegation cried louder than the other, and each party tried to influence its political friends to join with it upon the assurance that the passage of that bill would insure success in the approaching election. Some one was cheated there, as we all know, and some one will be cheated in Ohio on the wool question. [Laughter.]

It is claimed that high protection means a high price for labor. Who makes that claim, and where does it come from? Pennsylvania has a fair representation in that direction.

Now, Mr. Chairman, who appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means previous to the drafting of this bill by the committee? Representatives of large associations and industries, gentlemen of means, and attorneys of large corporations, and in their arguments, with tears in their eyes, they appealed to the committee not to make any reduction in the revenues of the Government, all in the interest of the poor man! They with millions in their pockets saying nothing about themselves, but wiping away tears at the very thought of the poor man's imperiled interests.

Most of those gentlemen who did appear before that committee, if I am correctly informed, came at the suggestion and request of some of the members of the minority of the Committee on Ways and Means for the purpose of giving them the material for their arguments in opposition to this bill. Now we go to the House and listen to the speeches; a more pitiful story never was told. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], my colleague [Mr. RUSSELL], Mr. MCKINLEY of Ohio, and Mr. JONATHAN CHACE of Rhode Island, all use the same argument, substantially, appealing for protection to the interests of the poor man; striving to leave the impression that the Democratic party, who favor cutting down the revenue of the Government, are the enemies of the poor man. Do you think the poor men or the laboring men are fools? Would they make these arguments to-day if we were not just on the eve of a Presidential election? If this question was simply looked at as it ought to be, on business principles only, and not with a view to catching votes, a different course would be pursued by many of the advocates of protection.

Whatever fine theories gentlemen may weave into their speeches, or whatever splendid rhetoric they may use to catch the popular ear, it all resolves itself at last into the practical question of what is best for every constituency.

Now, what are the facts of the case? Is it true or not that we collect about $100,000,000 more than we need to carry on the Government? I believe it is. If everything remains as it is, of course the revenue will remain the same, or nearly so. Is it right that it should remain so, or is it our duty to reduce it to the income which is required? If so, how? What would the result be should the bill now before the House become a law?

Some claim that this bill would, if passed, increase the revenue. Mr. MORRISON tells me that he has statistical estimates from the Government Departments which assure him that this bill would make a reduction of at least $30,000,000 per annum; hence one of my complaints against the bill. I would like to vote for a bill that would make a reduction of $100,000,000 per annum, and I hope some bill may be brought before the House having for its object such a reduction, or that amendments may be offered to the present bill that will accomplish that end. We can do that without making any reduction on whisky and tobacco. But not being responsible for the bill now before the House, and simply performing my duty as a Representative, I shall vote for this measure, believing that it will reduce the income of the Government, and for any and all amendments that lead to a further reduction up to one hundred millions. Having supported such measures, I should then feel that I had done my duty to my constituents and my country as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress.

The fact is that with all our machinery and labor fully employed we can produce more than we can consume. The safety of this Government largely depends upon the full employment of our labor, which happy result you are not now and never will be able to bring about under your present tariff system. Protection is in the interest of the rich and not the poor. The cheap talk about our trying to degrade American labor is all bosh. It is not true. The talk about our trying to put American labor in competition with the pauper labor of Europe is all bosh. Foreign labor is not at all pauper labor. I have seen a good deal of it. I have seen European laborers happy as lords—dancing, singing, drinking, smoking, and enjoying themselves more than most of our own laborers. Why? Under their system they get more enjoyment and pleasure for a great deal less money.

Our laborers do not all wear patent-leather boots or live in brown-stone houses. When you have lived to the age of most of the European countries I fear that you will have more pauper labor here than they now have there. I know many fear a change in our revenue system, but it must come sooner or later, and we might as well begin now as at any other time. Suppose you had a standing army of a million of your best men from 21 to 25 years of age, which I hope we may never see; suppose you had such a navy as many desire, and I should be glad to vote for if I had the opportunity, though I hope we shall never need it for actual war, and suffer the people to be taxed heavily to maintain these services, you would find a different state of affairs here from what you do now. Under those circumstances I presume my friends would want a little more protection than they have now.

The main trouble at the present time, as it seems to me, is that we are producing too much of everything, even too much legislation; in some places too much water, and in some too much whisky; in some places too much copper, and in others too much cotton or woolen goods. We certainly have too much protection, and too much talk in this House. [Laughter.] I desire to direct your attention especially to copper. The Calumet and Hecla mine, the largest copper mine in the word, which is largely owned in Boston, for the first time in its history recently passed a dividend. Why? Not because the mine does not yield as much as it ever did, but because the product of the mine can find no market.

With our great resources, plenty of steam and water power, and our young and healthy labor, the best machinery in the world, with capital as cheap as it is anywhere—with all these advantages we ought to be able to cope with the European manufacturers. Change your system, break down your wall, give us a chance to get out and our neighbors a chance to get in, and you will help labor as well as capital. Stop the howl for opening the doors of the Treasury. A friend of mind told me once, if you want to get rich keep poor, keep no money on hand that you do not require, put no money in the treasury that is not needed. This is my platform as a business man, and not as a politician, believing as I do that such legislation would redound to the credit of the members of this House and enhance the prosperity of our country. [Applause.]

During the delivery of Mr. MORSE's remarks the following occurred:

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman permit me to make an inquiry?

Mr. MORSE. Certainly.

Mr. WELLER. Paying $24.50 per week for your board now, as you have stated, would it not take more of your fixed income to pay that board, and would not more legal dollars be thus put in the way of going into the hands of producers—the laboring classes—than when you paid $4.50 per week?

Mr. MORSE. The more you pay for anything the richer you are, you mean to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELLER. Would it not be for the enhanced welfare of the producer, though it might be detrimental to you as a man of fixed income—an annuitant?

Mr. MORSE. I will come to that in a moment.

When Mr. MORSE had concluded his remarks, as they appear above,

Mr. STRUBLE said: Before the gentleman from Massachusetts resumes his seat I desire to ask him one question. The gentleman during his remarks narrated his experience as a practical business man in Boston. He stated that when he commenced business his expenses were low, and that as years passed those expenses and taxation increased. I wish to ask him whether he made or lost money in those years?

Mr. MORSE. I made money.

Mr. STRUBLE. I am glad of it.

Mr. MORSE. That is what I am in business for. [Laughter.]

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman, the tariff is a tax upon foreign articles imported into this country. While it is in the first instance paid by the importer, it is ultimately paid by the consumer. When it is levied for the purposes of the Government it is called a revenue tariff. When it is levied for the purpose of aiding individuals in their business enterprises it is called a protective tariff. To the former when laid fairly and without unjust discriminations I have no objection; but to the latter I am unalterably opposed.

On what ground shall the Government interpose to help the business of one at the expense of another? For you can not increase the price of goods of the seller without compelling the man who buys them to pay it. Why shall the Government assist one class out of the labor of another class when the one is no more entitled to the governmental protection than the other? If a man's business be a profitable one, it does not need the protection of the Government. If it be an unprofitable one, it furnishes a good reason why he should not continue it; but there is no reason why he should compel his fellow-citizens to pay higher prices for the articles he manufactures in order to make good his losses in a business into which he has voluntarily entered.

I deny the right of the Government to build up one man at the expense of another. If I am compelled by legislation to pay $150 for that which otherwise would cost me only $100, the seller has been armed with the taxing power of the Government to take from me $50 for his own benefit. I deny the right of the Government to surrender the taxing power to an individual. I deny the right of the individual to exercise it. When a man has earned a day's wages they are his own, and he ought to have the right to expend them where he pleases and where in his judgment they will do him the most good. If I can with my earnings make a better contract with a Mexican, or a Frenchman, or a Canadian, or an Englishman than with an American I ought to have the privilege of doing it; and the Government has no right to interpose except in so far as the necessities of its revenues may require.

If I have by a day's labor earned $1 it is my own. It represents the toil, the anxieties, the life of one day. It is all that I have in material product to represent that day. With that dollar I go to purchase from a Frenchman an article which I wish. The contract is about to be consummated. But the Government of the United States steps in with its power and says, "You shall not buy of this Frenchman; you must buy of an American"—a man, say, who manufactures this article at Providence, R. I. I go to him with my dollar and propose to buy the article which for that sum I could have obtained from the Frenchman. "No," says the manufacturer, "I charge more than a dollar for this article; you must pay me $2."

If I would purchase from the American I must go back to my toil and another day must go out of my life in order to get the additional dollar. I earn it and with it I buy the article from the American.

What is the significance of this transaction? By the power of the law I have been compelled to work one day against my will for the benefit of the American manufacturer. All of my effort and all of my toil for that day have been made his. In other words, for one day I have become his slave. He might just as well have awakened me in the morning hour and under the whip and the spur and the lash have compelled me to work for him until the setting of the sun as to do what he has done. Every dollar of increase of price which the protective tariff occasions is a day of slavery, and every hour of unnecessary labor that it requires is stolen from the invaluable time of individual responsibilities and duties.

I rest my whole case upon this proposition, that, subject to the necessities of the Government, every man has a right to sell where he can get the best price for what he has produced and to buy where he can buy the most cheaply. This is an approved doctrine of political economy and the plainest teaching of justice. It individualizes men; it begets in them a spirit of independence; it turns their eyes from the government to themselves. It fixes the boundary line between governmental power and personal right. It limits the authority of public administration. It teaches men that there is no arm so strong for their support as their own arm, and there is no business so successful as that which their own abilities and skill have established. In a word, it limits government to its proper sphere, and leaves individuals free to choose their own career, develop their own resources, and build up their own fortunes.

The present tariff of America is a high protective one. It increases the price of articles imported into this country 43 per cent. on the average, so that those who consume the imported articles must pay that increase. And it enables the American manufacturer to increase largely the price of the articles which he produces. It is true that the duty imposed does not always correspondingly increase the price of the similar domestic product. But the indisputable experience of the American people upon this point is that there has been an enormous increase in the price of domestic articles through the operation of the protective system.

In the few remarks I shall submit this afternoon I desire to show the injustice and the wrong that this system of protection has done to the principal interests of America as a reason for my support of the pending bill, which proposes a reduction of the tariff rates.

And, first, what has been the effect of protection upon our foreign commerce?

It is manifest that its influences in that direction can only be injurious. Trade is mutual exchange; and foreign trade is exchange of the productions of citizens of this country for the productions of the citizens of other countries. Every hinderance to the importation of foreign goods is an embarrassment to commerce. It prevents foreign goods from coming in, and to the same extent prevents domestic goods from going out. You can not have large exportations without having large importations. There is not a dollar's worth or a pound of foreign goods that can come into America without a compensatory pound or dollar's worth of American goods going out. Just as you keep the foreign goods out so you keep American goods in.

Trade is as a road between two cities; the freer and more unobstructed it is the better for the people of both. If one erects an obstacle in one part of the road it makes difficulties in the path of exchange. If the other puts in an obstacle equally high, then the difficulties of the exchange are doubled.

Every tariff duty is a burden on foreign commerce and a hinderance to the exchange of commodities. And it is often doubly so, for it affords foreign nations excuses for keeping American goods from their countries.

More injurious still is this protective system to our carrying trade. In 1855 we built in this country four hundred vessels for the foreign carrying trade; in 1879 we built but thirty-five. In 1857 Great Britain had 950,000 tons engaged in trade between that country and this, but now she has nearly 6,000,000 tons. In 1857 we had engaged in the foreign trade over 4,000,000 tons; now we have scarcely 600,000.

I saw in the papers the other day that of all the thousands of vessels that passed through the Isthmus of Suez last year not a single one carried the American flag. Of the four hundred steamers plying between this country and the continent of Europe and other portions of the world only four have been carrying the American flag; and I understood the other day that they had been sold to a British line.

A distinguished officer of our Navy told me that on his first trip to South America, in 1859, more than half of the flags he saw in South American ports were American flags, and that when he went down there four years ago he did not see the flag of this country at all except upon the vessels owned by the Government. So completely has this carrying trade passed under foreign control that last year we paid in freight $120,000,000 to foreign vessel-owners.

It is a question of only a little time when under this policy the American flag will disappear entirely from the high seas. And I charge now that the protective system of America is largely responsible for this result. It prohibits the importation of foreign vessels for American registry. American capitalists who desire to engage in the carrying trade must buy foreign-built vessels, put over them a foreign flag, employ foreign sailors. And the greater part of the money expended in these enterprises goes into the pockets of foreign vessel-men and foreign sailors.

Upon ship-building also the effect of this system has been most disastrous. The time was when many towns in New England were thriving on account of the business of building ships. Now they have gone into decay. Why? Because of the high price of materials which protection occasions. The protective tariff makes the price of materials for building ships as they are constructed to-day so much higher here than in England, that it is impossible for us to compete with that country in that business. A vessel which would cost, if built on the Clyde, $100,000, will cost in this country nearly $140,000, in consequence of the difference in the price of materials caused by the tariff. How can we expect, with the handicapping influences of this increase of price, to compete with England in this business?

I know it has been said—it was said before the Committee on Ways and Means a few days ago by one of the prominent ship-builders of the East—that the reason we can not compete with England in this industry is the high wages which we are obliged to pay. I have the statement of the largest ship-builder on the great lakes that there is no substantial difference in the wages paid to those engaged in ship-building on the Clyde and those paid in this country; and in the experience of the very company, of which the Western ship-builder referred to is one of the proprietors, there was not long ago an instance which proves this. This company was engaged in building several vessels for a great railway line. It sent to the Clyde to get English and Scotch workmen. It brought here one hundred and fifteen, who went to work at Wyandotte, in Michigan, where they remained several months. Their wages were not satisfactory. They demanded an increase, which was refused them. After some further time spent in the service of the company they again demanded an increase. It was again refused. They resolved at a meeting that their condition was not satisfactory, then packed up their kits and all returned to the Clyde, with plenty of work to keep them in Wyandotte if they had desired to remain. And in sixty days Americans, and Pennsylvanians at that, took the work which these foreigners had abandoned and at the wages they had refused to receive.

Mr. Chairman, nothing is clearer to my mind than that the destruction of our foreign carrying trade is the result of the prohibition of American registry to foreign-built ships and the high price of materials for ship-building which the tariff occasions. There is nothing so humiliating to an American as this decadence in our shipping and our foreign trade. The oceans are free for all. They are beyond the influence of the selfish restrictive policies of any nation. Any person may go there with any craft and any flag he pleases, to sail whithersoever he desires. But in this free-for-all where is America? The adventurousness of every nation is there to grow rich but ours. The skill of the sailor of every nation is there asserting itself but ours. Fortunes are there being built up by the peoples of all nations of the earth except ours. Yet this is an ocean-bound Republic! Every ripple of the waters upon the sea-shore is an invitation to enjoy the wealth of foreign nations; and every stormy wave that beats upon the crags speaks in thundering denunciation of the policy that would lock America out of the markets of the world. [Applause.] God speed the day when the diviner thought of man's brotherhood with man shall supersede the degrading and belittling one of national isolation and foreign exclusion. [Renewed applause.]

What is the effect of this protective system upon the farmer? As in the case of all other consumers, it increases to him the price of most of the articles that enter into his daily consumption. An accurate estimate has demonstrated that this increase of price to the farmers of this country amounts to the sum of $450,000,000 annually; truly an enormous sum for this hard-worked industry to pay. And for it, Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no compensation to the farmer in the protective system. The duties on wool and other agricultural products do not help him. For reasons which I stated on another occasion in this House the wool tariff has been of no benefit to him. It is absurd to say that the tariff on other agricultural products can help him when he produces a surplus which must find its market abroad.

But this system embarrasses him in another way. It operates to increase the prices of transportation of his grain from the West to the seaboard and to Europe. It must be remembered that when the grain of the American farmer reaches Liverpool it is there in competition with the grain of every farmer of the world. The protective tariffs of America are unable to help him there. The price of his grain is there determined by the laws of competition, and every dollar of increased price which transportation occasions makes less the residue of profit to him. The cheaper the freights to Europe for the farmer the greater his profit, and the dearer his freights the less his profits.

What is the effect of the protective system upon the rates of transportation? The expenses of building and operating railroads in this country are increased about 40 per cent. by the tariff. The cost of locomotives, of steel rails, cars, car-wheels, coal, machinery, of all manufactured articles which railroads require, is increased in the amount just named. Inevitably this increase in the price of constructing and operating the roads must be made up in increased transportation rates; and this increase of rates is what the farmer has to pay, which, when paid, takes largely away from his profit on the sale of his grain abroad.

Mr. Chairman, I agree that the rates of transportation in the last few years have been much reduced; but if the railroads can live now with the present rates, is it not plain, if by reducing the tariff you can cheapen their cost of construction and operating expenses, that they can stand a decrease in the rates? And every cent of decrease which comes will inure to the benefit of the farmer.

But, Mr. Chairman, the protective tariff does its worst injury to the farmer in the embarrassments it causes to the foreign market. Whatever may be said by gentlemen about the value of the domestic market to the farmer, the fact remains that the foreign market is necessary unless the production of cereals in this country is largely diminished. We have a surplus of more than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for last year, and this surplus must increase rather than diminish.

It must not be forgotten, as I said a while ago, this wheat finds its market in Liverpool in competition with all the wheat of the world. The price of the wheat there is determined by competition. This competition not only fixes the price of the wheat sold there, but of every bushel sold at home. It is the Liverpool market which determines the price of wheat which may be sold at Chicago, Toledo, Milwaukee, or any of the great grain centers of the West.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Does the gentleman object to my interrupting him right here?

Mr. HURD. Certainly not.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman whether the market at Liverpool or the demand for wheat abroad has any more effect on the price of wheat than a like demand for wheat at home?

Mr. HURD. I am speaking, sir, of the sale of the surplus of wheat production of America, which the American market is powerless to consume.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a single question?

Mr. HURD. No, sir; I do not care to be interrupted just now.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, this surplus sold at Liverpool fixes the price for every bushel of wheat that is sold here, and if that surplus of 100,000,000 bushels could not be disposed of abroad, but remain here, the result would be to bring the price down at home below the cost of production.

Now, sir, this foreign market so indispensable to the American agriculturist, who always will produce a surplus to be sold abroad, the protective tariff embarrasses and threatens. It is a continual menace to it. It has already robbed America of half of the markets of the Old World and of this. The high duties in Germany and France and Italy and Spain and Portugal and Canada and Mexico are kept up avowedly in many instances in retaliation for the high duties we have against them; and thus this protective system has armed the people of all these great countries with an excuse for keeping out this surplus of American grain.

Why, Mr. Chairman, under wise modes of legislation and with wise reciprocity treaties negotiated between this country and other nations we could in less than six months, I believe, open the markets of 150,000,000 of people to the grain of the farmers of this country.

After the countries named had imposed high duties on our products there was little left of our foreign market except what England and the free cities of Germany afforded. And England, because the American tariff prevents the importation of English goods, has sought to find her food supplies elsewhere. Under the impulse of this necessity the most amazing fact of modern times has been developed. India, old and effete, from whose territory very little exportation had hitherto been made, is becoming to Great Britain the source of her grain supply. Under the influence of the policy of the Marquis of Ripon, who went out as governor-general about four years ago to that country, the Indian Government was induced to abrogate its protective tariff, and the vast markets of 220,000,000 of people were opened to the operations of the principle of free trade. Instantly the attention of England was directed to the agricultural development of that country.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield a moment just there—a single moment?

Mr. HURD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. The 3 or 5 per cent. protective duty had been repealed by the Marquis of Ripon's predecessor, against the advice of his council, before Ripon went to India, and a 5 per cent. tax on raw cotton, when imported, had also been imposed before the Marquis of Ripon became governor of India.

Mr. HURD. I am perfectly aware of the proposition the gentleman states, but it is not by any means inconsistent with the assertion I have made.

Mr. KELLEY. But I did not want it charged on so humane a statesman as the Marquis of Ripon that he had done a great wrong to humanity.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the Marquis of Ripon is the representative of the liberal party of England in India, sent there to secure the abrogation of India's protective tariff system and open her markets to the operation of the principles of free trade. [Applause.]

This policy has been carried out, and under Ripon's administration, as I have said, India has adopted commercial freedom. Immediately Great Britain commenced the development of India's agricultural production. Large extents of territory were made cultivable through the adoption of systems of irrigation. Railroads were commenced and the work of construction was vigorously pushed. The interior was thus opened up to the coast, so that the products of the soil could be cheaply loaded in the vessels. Then the most suitable seeds were distributed among the people. Cheap agricultural machinery was afforded them. Under this impulse wheat production was so stimulated that last year there was a production in India of more than 300,000,000 bushels, of which a large portion was a surplus above domestic consumption. Of this 40,000,000 of bushels have been exported, while five years ago there was scarcely a cargo of grain sent from the shores of that country. In the first three months of this year this exportation has largely increased over the same period of last year, indicating for this year an exportation of nearly 70,000,000 bushels.

What has been the effect of this increased production in India upon our markets? In the last nine months there has been a decline in the exportation of American cereals of $47,000,000 in value, and wheat has gone down in Chicago to less than 80 cents a bushel, the lowest price that has ever been known in that market. It is notable, Mr. Chairman, that just as the exportation of wheat has increased from India the exportation has diminished from the United States. This development of wheat production in India is the natural and the inevitable result of the protective tariff in America, which puts high duties on foreign goods. England refuses to buy of the farmers of America, who will not take her goods in exchange, and seeks her food supply from those countries who will take her productions; and thus from the farmers of America is passing away the last vestige of a foreign market.

I say to the farmer of America that the prospect for him is by no means encouraging. With elevators, granaries, and warehouses all filled to overflowing, with the old crop still unsold, with the vast fields of the great West greening to the coming harvests, with crops unexcelled in India almost ready for the market, with splendid promise among all the wheat-growing nations of the earth, and with the price of wheat less than 80 cents at Chicago, I predict that before January next the price of wheat will be so low that it will not pay the cost of production, and the corn raised on the Western prairies will be burned again for fuel as was the case years ago. When that time arrives the farmers will be beggars in the midst of their own plenty and paupers by the side of their own golden gathered sheaves. [Applause.] There is absolutely no relief to the American farmer except in the making of foreign markets for him. Talk about the home market which American manufacturers make for him! Already their demand for agricultural products is diminishing; already they are complaining of overproduction everywhere. It is not in their power to consume what the farmers of this country can produce. There are, Mr. Chairman, but two ways in which the farmer can find relief. One is for the proper authorities to make reciprocity treaties by which the markets of other nations will be open to the products of this country, and the other is for Congress to reduce the expense of living by cutting down the tariff rates.

The farmers sell in the lowest market and buy in the highest. They can not cheapen any further the cost of production, but they can reduce the tariff, cheapen the cost of living, and thus save $450,000,000 annually.

Mr. Chairman, I think it would be well for the protectionists to listen to words of wisdom now. The Morrison bill as it stands proposes only small reductions of tariff rates, which might, if passed, satisfy for the time the great agricultural people of this country; but if those interested in protection reject this bill, if they will not listen to or accept terms of compromise, then I believe that in less than a year the farmers of America will rise from the lethargy in which they are slumbering and sweep in an hour the whole system away, as in New England recently the stately structures of men's enterprise disappeared in an instant in the floods which human obstacles were powerless to restrain.

But what is the effect of this system upon manufacturing? Here it is claimed that the greatest blessings of protection are to be found. It is insisted that it develops and builds up that industry. All the gains and fortunes of our manufacturers have been attributed to it, and the sums paid as wages to labor are claimed as its results.

I have often thought that people in considering this branch of the subject do not give sufficient attention to the effect of our patent laws in giving protection. Those who manufacture with the protection of our patent system have a monopoly of that business for seventeen years. They can in most cases charge, in consequence of this monopoly, whatever they please for the article manufactured, because they are free from competition by their patent. They do not need any protective tariff. Indeed, the latter can only do them injury, for as the manufacturers of the patented article can charge the same price without a tariff as with it, the only effect of the tariff upon them is to increase the price of their raw material and plant, and thus diminish their profits. From what I have been able to learn about the history of manufacturing in this country, I am satisfied that four-fifths of those who have been successful in that business have become so through the operation of the patent laws, who if they knew their own true interest would now be bitter enemies of the whole protective tariff system.

But what is the effect of the tariff upon those manufacturers who have the protection of the tariff alone? I have been surprised at the want of knowledge exhibited by manufacturers with whom I have talked upon this subject. When I have asked them how the protective tariff affected them, I have found very few who could tell me exactly the increase of price which the tariff made to them in their business. And when I asked them how much it affected the price of their product at any particular time they were almost always unable to tell. When I have inquired how much the tariff increased the prices of their raw material and plant, and of the articles they were obliged to have in order to manufacture, I have found scarcely any who had given attention to this point. Why, Mr. Chairman, they will investigate the laws of trade, the laws of supply and demand; they will study the question of location, the question of interest, and every other question that affects their business; but they will not read the statute-books of their country in order to learn how the laws of the land affect them. And yet these very same people will say that the supporters of the Morrison bill are disturbers of business, because they propose to disturb existing laws, the methods of the operation of which upon them they admit they do not understand.

I know, however, of some manufacturers who have studied this question. I have a statement by one of the leading manufacturers in the State of Ohio, a manufacturer of paper, who says if the duties were taken off of all the plant and all the raw material he was obliged to have in order to make paper he would surrender the duty on paper itself.

Mr. JOSEPH D. TAYLOR. What kind of a manufacturer did the gentleman say that was?

Mr. HURD. He has been one of the largest manufacturers of paper in the State of Ohio. And I have the statement made by one of the largest woolen manufacturers in the State of New York, at a public meeting in Chicago, a meeting at which I believe my colleague on the Committee on Ways and Means, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. McKINLEY], presided, to the effect that if the Government would give him free trade in brick and stone and mortar and building material and machinery and coal and wool and dye-stuffs, and all he needed in order to manufacture, he would take free trade for his manufactured product. What was that but to say that all that protection gave him with the one hand it took away from him with the other? I believe if the manufacturers of this country in the present condition of the market would study this question, they would find that the increase of price the tariff gives them is more than consumed in the increase of the price of plant, of raw material, and of everything else they must have in order to manufacture what they sell.

Anyhow I am willing as one of the Committee on Ways and Means to propose to the manufacturers of this country, if they will show what the net result of protection is to them that I will help to pass a law giving them that net result, leaving them undisturbed in every other respect. The effect of that would be to make the rates much lower than those fixed in the Morrison bill, to leave the manufacturer as well off under the law as he is at present and give the people cheaper goods everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, all manufacturers need cheap raw materials and plant and a large market to sell to. The protective tariff deprives them of both. It increases the price of the one from 40 to 50 per cent. more than it ought to be, and it necessarily limits the other. The manufactturers all over the country now are complaining of overproduction. Overproduction is only another word for the phrase limited market; for no man overproduces who has a market large enough to consume what he makes. Our manufacturers are fastened in the American market. The very law which gives them the control of the home market deprives them of every other. The inevitable effect of protection in increasing the price of production disables them from competing with the foreigner who manufactures with cheaper material.

Sir, this very day manufacturing enterprises everywhere are in a condition of embarrassment, and, as manufacturers have testified before the Ways and Means Committee, because they have more goods on hand than they can sell. The necessity has come to them of a greater market than the domestic one, and they must have it; but they never can have it as long as the high tariff stands in the way of trade and exchange. If there ever was a day in America, Mr. Chairman, when manufacturers were benefited by protection, that day has gone now. An answer to the statement, that a continuance of protection is necessary to manufacturing, is found in the history of England. In 1844 all of the manufacturing industries of that country were in a state of stagnation, brought about by the protective system. They were unable to dispose of their surplus abroad. Their larger establishments were closed. Thousands of men were turned out to starve. The poor-houses were full. Bread riots were threatened in every city of the country. Then John Bright, Daniel O'Connell, and Richard Cobden, and others determined to begin the agitation of free trade.

Interrupted, opposed by stupid persons who were afterward to be most benefited by what they did, in 1846 they succeeded, and the most obnoxious features of the protective tariff of Great Britain were stricken out and a close approximation to free trade was made. And what has been the result to English manufactures? Never in the history of the world has there been such a growth in any business as has been witnessed in manufactures there. The highest degree of prosperity has been attained. From less than $300,000,000 worth a year the total exportation of English manufactured articles has reached more than $1,500,000,000 worth a year. The cheapening of the prices of the domestic article has enormously increased the consumption at home. England supplies, with her machinery, her cloths and her cotton goods, every nation under the sun. Princely fortunes have been made by her manufacturers, who are now monopolizing all the opportunities the world's traffic affords.

Think you that if free trade were hostile to manufacturing such would have been the result there? If the abrogation of the tariff laws brought such results to England, why should not the abrogation of our tariff laws bring similar results here? In this country now, as in 1844 in England, our manufactures are in a state of overproduction; they can not get rid of the surplus they have produced. Their laborers are striking and are turned out to starve. The England of 1844 is the America of 1884. Riots are abroad in the land; the spirit of discontent in one of the most conservative cities of the country recently suggested the bloody days of the French revolution.

Our manufacturers have not markets large enough; they have surrendered the markets of the world to England. Last year England sold abroad one billion five hundred million dollars' worth of manufactured goods, and America, exclusive of the manufactured products of agriculture, sold abroad barely seventy million dollars' worth. Fifteen hundred millions of dollars for that little stormy island and $70,000,000 for this continent! Yet we have opportunities and advantages vastly superior to hers. She has to go thousands of feet under the land and under the sea to get her iron and her coal, and go thousands of miles over the land and the sea to get her cotton and her wool. We find here our iron and coal close to the surface, on the mountains and hill-sides, and can tumble them together into the furnaces. We have the vast cotton-fields of the sunny South and the wide pasture-fields of the West for sheep to give us abundance of cheap cotton and cheap wool. It is an ineffaceable stain on the American name that the markets of the world have thus been surrendered to Great Britain, our great rival. Think you that if we could have sold abroad of our manufactured goods one billion dollars' worth last year there would have been this stagnation, overproduction, and depression?

If I could burn into the brains of the manufacturers of America one sentence, it would be this: "Turn from this constant introspection to the nations of the earth; down with the walls, out to the sea." There are 2,000,000,000 people in the world who want to buy what you make. Rise to the height of the great thought that this immense population can be supplied by you with the implements of husbandry, the tools of artisanship, and the various articles of human handicraft. But they will not take your goods until you take theirs. Let your tariff disappear, and then, oh, manufacturer, your attention will be diverted from the profitless contests of domestic competition to the generous rivalries of foreign trade; and in the easy victories which you will win a wealth will come to you of which you do not dream to-day. [Great applause.]

In conclusion, let me say a word as to the effect of this tariff system upon the wages of labor. It is claimed that the wages of the laborer are increased by protection. This can not be, except upon this theory: that by legislation you keep out of this country the products of foreign manufacturers from competition with the products of the American, and thereby the latter is enabled to charge higher prices for his goods, out of which he makes greater profits, from which he is enabled to pay and does pay larger wages to his employés.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended. He is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, and all the other members who have spoken have had their time extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to extending the time of the gentleman from Ohio? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HURD. It is manifest that this theory can not apply to the ordinary day laborer, or to artisans like the mason and carpenter, or to the farm worker, or the railway employé, for none of those make any articles with which similar foreign articles can come into competition. These, therefore, are all unprotected laborers, and the only influence of the tariff upon them is to increase the cost of their living, and thus to take from instead of to add to their wages.

But it is said that the laborers are benefited and wages increased in the manufacturing industries. I am perfectly willing to admit that if you will compare this country with any other country of the Old World which has precisely the same tariff policy the wages in this country will be, as they ought to be, higher than the wages there. Take, for instance, England and America, and let them both have either the same protective tariff or the same policy of free trade, and you will always find wages higher here than there. But this not because of the effect of the legislation, but as a result of the peculiarly favorable conditions for labor which we enjoy politically and territorially.

The protectionist, starting with the proposition that wages are higher here, maintains that there should therefore be protection to American labor, in order that it may not be brought into competition with the pauper labor of the Old World. My mind reaches the very opposite conclusion. The fact that we have high-priced labor here, better wages for labor, here than abroad, is conclusive evidence to me that we do not need protection, and that what we do need is the speedy opening of the markets of the world.

High-priced labor means efficient labor, skilled labor, intelligent labor, productive labor. Pauper labor means inefficient labor, unskilled, unintelligent, unproductive labor. Let competition come between high-priced labor and pauper labor, and pauper labor will always go to the wall. I can understand why the poorly paid laborers of the Old World should get down on their knees and lift up their hands and pray for protection against the high-priced labor of America; but I can not understand why the high-priced, efficient, productive labor of America should beg protection against the products of the pauper labor of the world.

Mr. Chairman, it is inevitable that when competition comes between these classes of labor, high-priced labor must always win the victory. I will mention an instance which will illustrate my meaning. Gunny-bags are made out of jute, and this manufacture is carried on very largely in Calcutta by the cheapest labor in the world, the women getting from 5 to 8 cents a day and the men from 17 to 20 cents. Within a short time, as I have been informed, a gentleman has started the business of making gunny-bags in one of our Eastern cities. He has built his structure, obtained his machinery, and he pays women employés 80 cents to $1 a day, men $1.25 and $1.50. Yet with this high-priced labor he has almost gotten control of the gunny-bag market in South America and this country. He says if you will let him have jute free he will undersell the Indian pauper labor in the streets of Calcutta itself. [Applause.]

When the markets of the world are all opened to us, what kind of labor do we want to compete with? Shall it be labor better paid, more intelligent, more productive than ours? In that case we shall soon be driven out of the market. Shall it be labor equally well paid and efficient with our own? Then it is an eye-to-eye, face-to-face, teeth-to-teeth combat. But if we are to compete with the pauper labor of the world, then all hail the coming victory of America's labor!

Mr. Chairman, while I admit that wages in this country ought to be higher than in England or any other country in the world, supposing the same legislative policy to prevail in the two countries selected for contrast, I regret to say they are not as much higher in this country now as they ought to be, because of the evil influences of the protective system. I believe that nearly all the natural advantages which our laborers enjoy are lost through the enforcement of this artificial system of protection. Take a man who gets $1 a day in England. How much ought an American to receive in order to be equal with him? To answer this question three things must be considered: first, the expenses of living or the purchasing power of the earnings; second, the steadiness or continuance of the employment; and third, the productiveness of the labor. Now, it is admitted that, with the exception of articles of food, the expenses of living in this country are one-third more than in England.

The statistics show that American laborers will produce one-third more there than the English. During the last six years the laborers in this country have been out of employment nearly one-third of the time, while in England work has generally been steady and continuous. With these facts in view we will readily see what the American laborer should receive: one-third more in America, because of the increased cost of living; one-third more, because of the unsteadiness and uncertainty of the employment; and one-third more because of the greater productiveness of labor. This would mean that an American, to be equal to the English laborer who receives $1 a day, must receive $2. But he does not. Statistics show that in this country in all these protected industries wages are on the average a little over $1 a day, while in England in the same industries wages are but a trifle less.

But whatever be the result of this comparison, I ask you to contrast two nations similar in territory and population—one under free trade and the other under protection; or two eras of the same country—one a protective era, the other a free-trade era. Take England and Germany, for example—Germany with protection, and England with free trade; the wages in England are twice as high as in Germany. Or take England under a protective era before 1844 and under the free-trade era since. The wages of labor since the free-trade policy was adopted there have increased more than 60 per cent., and expenses of living have diminished more than 40 per cent.; so that the working classes are to-day 100 per cent. better off under free trade than they were under protection.

In this country between 1850 and 1860 we had a low tariff. The ratio of increase in wages was greater then than for the last ten years under protection. The wages of most industries were actually higher in 1860 than 1880. The expenses of living then were 25 per cent. less than now. So the laborers of America were better off under the closest approach to free trade we ever have had here than they ever have been under the policy of high protection.

There is one additional fact to which I desire to call attention; it was developed in the testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means. Many of the manufacturers admitted they have been compelled to reduce the wages of labor because, as they said, of the high price of material. That is, if they had not such high price to pay for material, if they could have obtained cheaper material, they would not have been obliged to reduce the wages of labor. What does that mean? A protective tariff makes high-priced material. It is inevitable that the situation should be just as these manufacturers stated. Every one of them wants labor and material in order to manufacture his product, and the higher the price of the material the harder will be the bargains he makes with his laborers. The high protective tariff increases the material avowedly, and when the day of stagnation comes reduction must occur somewhere. It can not occur in the price of material, for it has been made high by the arbitrary act of Congress. It must occur in the wages of labor, which are settled by the law of supply and demand. To put it syllogistically, high-priced material has compelled the reduction of wages of labor in most of the manufacturing industries of this country; the protective tariff is largely responsible for high price of material; therefore the protective tariff is largely responsible for the reduction of the wages of labor all over the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the condition of labor everywhere is unsatisfactory. The president of the Knights of Labor the other day said in a public meeting that nearly a million of men had been out of employment all through this winter. The suffering has been intense. Whole families have been removed to the poor-house. There was a discharge of five hundred men from the leading locomotive works of the United States the other day, with a promise that five hundred more should be discharged in ten days. In a town in Rhode Island not long ago whole families were in danger of starvation, and had to be supported by public charity.

Mr. CHACE. What is the name of that town?

Mr. HURD. Quidnick. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CHACE. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will permit me positively, flatly, and absolutely to contradict it.

Mr. HURD. I can give you the particulars of the statement as I saw it.

Mr. CHACE. I have no doubt the gentleman——

Mr. HURD. It was stated that the first evidence of the condition of these poor people was found in men and women going out and picking from the frozen ground little pieces of wood that had been dropped from passing loads there during the preceding fall, and these afforded the only fuel they had. On discovering this, the people of the town gave them the charity which kept them from perishing.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in every part of the land the condition of the laboring population, as I have said, is unsatisfactory. There is complaint of the wages which are being paid to labor. I insist that these are the results of the protective system which has dragged the country away from the natural condition of free trade. We are bound to judge of these conditions as they occur, and I charge from the events of recent experience in this country that the fruits of protection in America are want, penury, and starvation. These are the glories of its triumphs, these are the jewels of its crown. I would that the workers of the country would cease to hug to themselves the delusion that protection is a help to them. It comes to them in the guise of a friend, but it is really their mortal enemy. Its hand is lifted in the attitude of benediction, but it is really raised to curse. It never will permit while it prevails that the laborers shall have the share to which they are entitled of the profits of their employers.

If, Mr. Chairman, the employer will not learn wisdom by investigating these economic questions, I hope the agitation upon this subject, now begun, will at least enlighten the workers, and that by their votes they will teach a lesson to the manufacturers, one which will give to them the markets of the world, which will open the doors that have been closed against them, and which will relegate their business to the government of the natural laws of trade. In such a condition the workingmen of America may be assured that the wages of labor will be better and the employment steadier than they have ever been under the policy of protection.

Mr. Chairman, I support the pending bill because it proposes to give relief to all of these oppressed industries. It reduces, as I understand it, the revenues of the country nearly $30,000,000; but whether it reduces the revenues or not, it unquestionably reduces taxation. It gives to the people cheap clothing, cheaper fuel, better shelter than they have heretofore received. Who, Mr. Chairman, will object to these measures of relief? Will the Republican object, when he remembers that it was his party that passed the tariff law during the days of the war, when a promise was made to the country that the tariff should be abrogated as soon as the war was over, that it was simply a temporary measure?

Will it be the Republican, whose party created and organized the Tariff Commission, which reported the very reduction proposed here by this bill, and which, while it has had control of the House and the Senate, has in one body or the other, placed lumber, coal, and salt upon the free-list? Will it be the Democrat who objects to the bill, he who belongs to a party which declared in its last national platform, as its last official utterance on this subject, in favor of a tariff for revenue only, and which in its first platform in the language of Thomas Jefferson declared in favor of commercial freedom with all nations? If he be a Democrat who does not agree with the resolutions contained in the national platform, but who prefers what is known as the Ohio resolution, then I ask him if there is anything in the Morrison bill inconsistent with that?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I will answer the gentleman "yes" right there. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HURD. Then I am glad to hear it, and will be glad to have you and those who agree with you upon the records of this House in that declaration.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I hope, sir, to place myself upon record just in that way.

Mr. HURD. You will be on the record in advocacy of that sentiment, and I am glad to have the gentleman say so. I had hoped, sir, that there was no man on the floor of this House who claims to be a Democrat who would object to taking off the war tax of twenty-five years ago from the people of this country. [Applause.] And if it be the meaning of the gentleman that reduction of war taxes and the giving of cheaper fuel and shelter to the people are inconsistent with the Ohio resolutions, if that be the construction he gives to the Ohio platform, I say here and now that I shall appeal to the gallant Democrats of my native State and ask them to repudiate the heresy of his platform. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt of the result of that appeal, and that it will be to place the Democracy of that State where it wishes to be now, as I believe, and where it ought to be, close to the great heart of the national Democracy on this question. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen say it is not politic to agitate this question now. It is too late for a Democrat to say that, sir, on this floor. There is nothing in principle in this bill, which takes off the taxes of the war, which gives the people cheap shelter, cheap salt, cheap fuel, to which any Democrat should object. There is nothing in it which is contrary to Democratic principles. The only question remaining is one of policy or expediency, as to whether the measure should be considered at this time. From time immemorial it has been the usage of the Democratic party that the majority should determine all questions of party policy. That is one of the fundamental rules of its organization. It was determined here by the Democrats of this House by a vote of two-thirds that it was expedient to consider the bill. It is too late, then, to question that decision; but, sir, even if the caucus had not so declared, the consideration and discussion of the questions that are presented in this bill could not be prevented. Neither the ambitions nor the fears of men can stay it. The agitation has already begun. It is heard throughout the land. The people, long silent and quiet, are moving now. The culture and the chivalry of the nation, long anxious for this hour, are ready to take the lead. The conflict can not be longer delayed and the end can not be doubtful. Private extortion must yield to public right. Selfish interests must be sacrificed to the general good, and each individual's manhood must be left free, unhindered, and unhelped by Government, to work out its own destiny. And in the glorious result of the struggle I am sure that this protection giant of robbery and oppression will disappear from the land, never again to offend America by his presence nor to darken its fair fields with his shadow. [Loud and prolonged applause.]

Mr. GEDDES. My colleague from Ohio [Mr. HURD] who has just addressed the committee has again by the eloquent and impressive manner in which he has presented his views to the committee excited my highest admiration. From his youth up, at the bar and on the floor of this House, I have never failed to yield to him that admiration. And listening with the other members of this House to his eloquence, I have experienced to-day a mental pleasure that would have led me out with other gentlemen to congratulate my colleague if I had not been next in order. But, sir, at the bar and on the floor of this House I have always felt after indulging in my admiration as if I were called to come back to the stern realities of life and to realize that I lived among men and not among angels.

The tariff question has been one of the great economic questions periodically agitating the public mind from the foundation of the Government.

Taxes now imposed greatly in excess of the necessities of the Government, thereby imposing unnecessary burdens upon the people, force into prominence this question. In considering it we should not be misled by general terms sometimes used to express the principle involved. They are deceptive. We find the shibboleth of some has been and still is a "high protective tariff." They cling to this theory as if it would guard the business interests of the country against all evils.

The battle-cry of others is "free trade." Charmed by a mere theory, they overlook its impracticability. It never has prevailed in this country, and no political party has ever attempted to secure it. We might as well discuss for all practical purposes the beauties of the millennium.

The Democratic Representatives of the people almost unanimously insist on a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government economically administered. The question demands a practical view, and the plain good sense and practical experience of the people will solve it. This Government has been administered in the past on both economic theories of high protection, and tariff for revenue with incidental protection. From 1824 for ten years the policy of our tariff legislation was protection. Then for eight years the opposite tendency prevailed, which was in turn again reversed and continued until the act of 1846. This anti-protective policy—this revenue tariff with its incidental protection—then continued until 1861, when our civil war broke out, calling for large and hitherto unknown expenditure and a corresponding demand for increased revenue. From that time our legislation produced immense revenue, until the legislation of last Congress pretended to make a reduction in obedience to the general demand of the country.

During the last-named period—from 1861 until 1883—with a high protective tariff, affording protection in some directions for the mere sake of protection, enacted without reference to the interest of consumers, we had times of great depression in values, suspensions of business, laborers thrown out of employment, and bankruptcy, real or threatened, that startled the whole country. Pauperism and pinching want increased to an alarming extent. A million of men suddenly forced out of employment presented an alarming condition of things. The working classes, in whose interest it is claimed protection is granted, suffered to a degree unknown in our history before. But the working classes were not the only sufferers. The general business interests of the country suffered, and thousands of business houses failed. Reliable statistics show the aggregate amount of failures between 1865 and 1878 reached the sum $1,000,000,000.

These admitted facts, forming a part of our recent history, demonstrate that the best business interests of this country and the prosperity and happiness of the laboring masses do not depend upon a high protective tariff. The condition of the country, requiring a tariff rate at one period in our history, might so change as to demand a wholly different rate at another period. The policy, therefore, applicable in the infancy of our Republic might prove very unwise at the present period in our history. The friends of a high protective tariff often refer to the first tariff act, passed soon after the adoption of the Constitution, to justify their theory. That first act was called a protective tariff. Washington declared that it was to protect and foster American manufactures, and yet the general rate of duties under that act was but 10 per cent. ad valorem. On the other hand, the tariff act of 1846 is commonly called a revenue act, and yet the rate of duty levied under it averaged 24 per cent.

The policy that should govern a people in levying tariff duties must therefore depend upon the peculiar circumstances and condition of things existing at the time. The motives and real interests that prompted and justified certain legislation in the early history of our country no longer exist, and the same legislation at this time would be very impolitic and injurious. In the infancy of our Republic, in the absence of manufactures, with a great scarcity of capital, the wisest statesmanship sought to encourage investment in manufacturing pursuits. From 3,000,000 of population we have grown to over 50,000,000. From the thirteen feeble States we have increased to thirty-eight great States, with Territories ripe for many more. No other country possesses such marvelous resources in mines, manufactures, agriculture, mechanic arts, and everything that gives wealth and power to a nation. With these surroundings capital no longer needs protection or bounties, and taxes should not be imposed merely to induce the investment of capital in profitable enterprises. Capital can and should protect itself, except as it is incidentally aided by a tariff for revenue judiciously adjusted in favor of infant and struggling industries.

With us now labor needs protection. Fair, just, and necessary wages must be secured to labor, whether engaged in mining, manufactures, agriculture, or any other industry. Competition from abroad that tends to degrade or prejudice labor in this country must be warded off and effectually guarded against. In levying taxes and in all our legislation we must not be unmindful of the highest and best interests of the American laborer, whether on the farm, in the workshop, in our mines, or wherever found.

Again, we must not overlook in the present consideration of this question the fact that we still have a large national debt and the current expenses of our Government are great. Revenue must be raised to meet these demands. This must be done by tariff duties on imports mainly. No other plan is seriously suggested or advocated.

The Democratic party recognizes the fact that we must have large revenue and that it must be raised as I have stated. We are therefore in favor of levying these duties for revenue. Thus revenue is the object. But we can not be unmindful of the fact also that to collect by customs duties this amount of revenue will necessarily afford protection to the various and varied industrial interests needing and deserving the fostering care of Government. The Democratic party insists that the protection thus incidentally given shall be equitably and wisely adjusted. We are therefore for a tariff for revenue with incidental protection.

Mr. Chairman, the last Democratic platform of principles in Ohio very forcibly and clearly expresses a safe and sound position on this question in these words:

> We favor a tariff for revenue limited to the necessities of the Government, economically administered, and so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies.

This platform of principle and policy of the Democratic party embodies all the elements that can justify or commend to our favor impost duties. It limits the amount to be raised to the necessary expenditures of the Government, and so adjusted in its details as to prevent unequal burdens. Economy and equality will thus be secured. It seeks just compensation to labor. Our republican form of government can only be maintained by a vigilant and scrupulous regard for the interests of the masses, upon whose physical and intellectual energies all our hopes depend. This platform, in keeping with the past history of the Democratic party, is an earnest protest against the policy that would degrade and oppress labor by unjust and unequal laws. It is also emphatic in its opposition to creating or encouraging monopolies.

Here we find ourselves at issue with the Republican party. The attitude of the two great parties on the tariff question is plain and easily understood. The Republican party is opposed to limiting the revenue to be collected to the necessary amount of the expenditures of the Government. They seek to encourage and aid capital by bounties, subsidies, and special privileges at the expense of labor. They impose upon the country a tariff that produces unequal, unjust, and iniquitous burdens. They have uniformly refused a just compensation to labor, and have diligently and persistently struggled to create and encourage monopolies. The Republican leaders are for a high protective tariff, protection to capital being the controlling object. They boldly announce themselves on the floor of this House for protection for the mere sake of protection. This they seek to accomplish without regard to the amount of revenue it brings the Government in excess of expenditures, or what is needed for an economical administration of the Government. This protection they would afford, though it manifestly produces monopolies and is unfriendly to the laboring interests of the country.

Mr. Chairman, the legislation of the last Congress presents a bold defiance of the well-known public sentiment of the country and reckless disregard of the interests of the people. At the opening of the first and long session of the last Congress the general public sentiment of the country conceded a change and reform of our tariff laws essential to the general interests of the country. It was known that the tariff as it existed was grossly burdensome to the people, bearing unequally upon the different interests of men, producing enormous revenue wholly unnecessary and thereby producing an overflowing Treasury. The tariff laws then in force had been mainly imposed and adjusted as a war measure. But after long years of peace the people felt that the public interests demanded a reform of the tariff. As it existed the evil influences of it startled the people. They saw $400,000,000 flowing into the Treasury annually. Thus over $1,000,000 every day in the year was drawn from the people. Two hundred and fifty million of this sum was consumed by the current expenses of the Government. But with all the wicked waste and extravagance of the Government a surplus of $150,000,000 was overdrawn from the people.

This full and overflowing Treasury at once became the center of attraction and temptation to all engaged in the infinite variety of plunder schemes to get at it. It tends directly to encourage all manner of extravagance. The star-route scheme never could have been carried out successfully in the absence of this plethoric Treasury. In favor of all the various projects before Congress for extravagant expenditure of money it is common to refer to our overflowing Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of these facts and in open defiance of public sentiment and the general interests of the people the Republican leaders in the interest of monopolies sought and secured delay in this reform. The long session of the last Congress was consumed in appointing a commission to investigate the question. Members of Congress thus divested themselves of a duty imposed on them by their constituents and farmed out the work and responsible duties which should have been at once promptly performed. A report of that commission was made to the last session of Congress which expired on the 4th of March, 1883. On that report a bill was framed and partially considered in the House.

The tariff bill that finally passed and became a law was never considered in the House. That bill, forced through this House without discussion or consideration, became the law of the land, governing and controlling the infinite variety of interests of 50,000,000 people. The bill had been considered in the Senate, was there passed, and sent over to the House for consideration. Then came the arbitrary political procedure that deprived the minority of the Representatives of the people of all opportunity to consider or debate the bill that passed. The rules of parliamentary procedure existing from the foundation of the Government for the protection of the people were changed to meet the emergency. By that extraordinary, indeed, revolutionary means, the present tariff law was forced through to its final passage, increasing instead of diminishing the burdens of the people, and was passed in the interest of the class of men whose interests are regarded and protected by Republican leaders.

Mr. Chairman, the appointment of the Tariff Commission was a great wrong, and the practical working of it a piece of cold-blooded and heartless discrimination in favor of the overgrown monopolies of the country against the agricultural and other laboring interests. The report of the Tariff Commission was framed to favor special manufacturing interests. The men appointed on that commission were the peculiar friends of special monopolies. The commissioners should have been men as impartial and free from bias as the judges of a court. They sat in judgment to consider the rights of 50,000,000 people with interests as diversified and important as ever before intrusted to men. Agriculture, with 50 per cent. of our working population engaged in it, struggling infant manufactures, mining, and other industries were disregarded in the blind and unjust zeal of the friends of monopoly, led on by the help of members of the Tariff Commission.

The people and their representatives had the right to demand an impartial report by disinterested men. On the contrary, Mr. J. L. Hays, the president of the Tariff Commission, and who made the report to Congress, came forward as the hired instrument of monopolies and threw into the scale the weight of his influence to procure a change of the rates and classification proposed by the commission. As the agent of the manufacturers, and not as the servant of the whole people, he presented a new schedule on the manufactures of wool. This aided to produce the great wrong imposed on the wool-growers.

Senator SHERMAN, in a speech made at Findlay, Ohio, during the last campaign, as reported in the Cleveland Herald, August 26, endeavored to shield the Republican party from the responsibility for unjustly discriminating against the great wool-growing interests. In that speech he discloses the conduct of the president of the commission. He says:

> When the report of the Tariff Commission proposed repealing the ad valorem duty on wool, and leaving only the specific duty, I acquiesced, for I noticed that a ratable reduction had been proposed on woolen goods. Subsequently Mr. J. L. Hays, the president of the Tariff Commission, and who had made the report to Congress, appeared as the agent of the manufacturers with a new schedule of the duties on the manufacture of wool, greatly changing the rates and classification proposed by the commission.

Another distinguished citizen of Ohio, Hon. Columbus Delano, ex-Secretary of the Interior and president of the Ohio Wool-Growers' Association, in a recent address before the association said:

> The personnel of this commission was not overlooked by the manufacturers. They, with a vigilance and industry that seem worthy of commendation, did not fail to secure as its president a distinguished gentleman of great experience and ability in such matters, who was and had been for many years their agent and salaried employé. It is true, as I understand, and if so it should be mentioned, that this gentleman resigned his official relations to the manufacturers before entering upon the duties of his office. It is equally true, as I am informed, that he resumed these official relations as soon as he was functus officio with the Tariff Commission.
> It is certainly true that as soon as his duties on the commission were ended he entered upon his normal duties as agent for the manufacturers, advocating and securing changes in the report of the commission greatly beneficial and advantageous to manufacturers.

Mr. Chairman, what a mortifying exhibition of the greedy, grasping, and overreaching power of monopolies. They are organized. By the use of appliances at their command they can have great economic questions decided by their own hired and paid agents. When the overburdened people demanded a reform of the tariff the scheme of a commission was devised composed of men devoted to special interests. Is it a matter of surprise, then, that the people should rebuke and drive from place and power a party capable of such a wrong? The tariff on wool imposed by the act of 1867 should not be classed or confounded with war taxes. It was prompted by different considerations. The motives that produced it still exist to sustain it.

Agriculture, commerce, mining, shipping, manufactures, and all the diversified industries of the country are vital to our welfare; but the greatest of these is agriculture. It lies at the foundation of them all. Half the working population of our country are engaged in the business of agriculture. Our marvelous growth and prosperity rest upon this solid foundation. Ninety per cent. of our exports have been furnished by agriculture. The large excess of exports over imports for a series of years secured us the great prosperity that brought about our so-called resumption. I know Republican leaders arrogate to themselves the credit of having accomplished by a resolution of Congress this desirable result; but it was brought about by the hard work and frugality of the great farming interests of the whole country, peculiarly favored by a beneficent Providence.

The wool-tariff act of 1867 was a measure of tardy justice. It was the result of an uprising of wool-growers. They had for long years submitted to the demands and exactions of grasping, grinding, and overreaching woolen-manufacturing capitalists. They had always borne a great share of the burdens imposed upon the consumers for the benefit of Eastern capitalists.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at the practical effects of the wool-tariff act of 1867. Prior to this tariff we raised in the United States but 60,000,000 pounds of wool annually, but under the encouragement of this act we raised in 1882 300,000,000 pounds. In Ohio the total clip of wool in 1860 was about 10,000,000 pounds, whereas in 1880 the product had increased to 25,000,000. Thus in Ohio wool-growing is a leading industry. It is an interest intimately and inseparably interwoven not only with agricultural pursuits, but with all our interests. This blow, therefore, inflicted by the last Republican Congress on this leading industry of our State affects all our citizens. We come to you insisting that the action of the last Congress in reducing the tariff on wool and at the same time increasing it on woolen goods was unjust and unwise. It lost to the wool-growers of Ohio $1,600,000 on the clip of 1883.

The Democracy of Ohio in State convention characterized this legislation as follows:

> The act of the Republican Congress in reducing the tariff on wool, while at the same time increasing it on woolen goods already highly protected, was iniquitous legislation, discriminating in favor of a monopoly and against the agricultural interests of the country, and ought to be corrected. And we heartily approve the action of the Democratic members of the Ohio delegation in Congress in voting against that measure.

Mr. Chairman, Democrats considered this small tariff imposed on foreign wool as a tariff for revenue with incidental protection. It fostered home industry. It could not possibly create a monopoly. It encouraged the highest and most essential form of industry. It involved the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number. It sought to make the foundation of all our greatness safe and substantial as the only judicious and wise means of protecting and saving the superstructure.

The policy of the Republican party has been to foster and protect by Government aid and class legislation manufactures and forms of industry that constitute the superstructure in our monument of growth and prosperity. They have been indifferent as to the stability and security of the foundation upon which all depended.

The Wool-Growers' Association of Ohio met in convention at Columbus, and took action in regard to the Republican legislation of last Congress in reducing the tariff on wool. Their emphatic denunciation should go to the whole country, and I therefore read it:

> The wool-growers of Ohio hereby express their indignation at the injustice done to the producers of wool and the business of sheep-husbandry by the recent action of Congress in reducing the duty on wool, and the way in which it was done is condemned by this association. These facts and others leading to the same conclusions demand of wool-growers and others connected with agricultural pursuits the most serious consideration, and lead us to the expression of the following sentiments:
> First. That it is our duty to commence at once and pursue unremittingly an effort to remove the injustice done to our interests by demanding a restoration of the tariff on wools, as established by the law of 1867.
>
> Second. If we fail in this, that we will insist on substantial reduction of duties on New England manufactures, because it is only just that if New England has free raw material and the benefit of the cheap wools of Australia and South America, we who use her fabrics shall have free goods and the benefit of the cheap fabrics of foreign nations.

Mr. Chairman, these utterances should be accepted as full of promise for the future, affording great encouragement to the struggling masses, so long oppressed by taxation for the benefit of a few. This declaration of principle is by men many of them hitherto leaders in the party that did the injustice condemned. But now, smarting under the wrong imposed upon them, they use Democratic sentiments, and demand a tariff "so adjusted in its application as to prevent unequal burdens, encourage productive industries at home, afford just compensation to labor, but not to create or foster monopolies."

We should all rejoice to find these elements for the adjustments of a tariff—these distinctive features of the Democratic creed—commanding the admiration and support of the friends of the great agricultural and laboring portion of our people. They constitute a platform upon which productive capital and labor can and should unite. This is the most important political problem now confronting us, to bring labor in every form in complete harmony with productive capital. They should go hand in hand. They must harmonize or both suffer. To continue in conflict, making war on each other, is like the hand trying to pull out the eye. When capitalists, impelled by cupidity and love of gain, seek to reduce the compensation of labor to the lowest point they produce strikes, as they are called, of our laboring men. These uprisings and earnest appeals of this class of men for fairness, equality, and even-handed justice can not be witnessed with indifference. It does not manifest any purpose to make war on capital. It is consistent with a conviction that capital is essential to the well-being, happiness, and prosperity of all workingmen. What an imposing exhibition to witness 10,000 sturdy, order-loving, and law-abiding citizens coming from their homes and their shops to make a public and solemn protest against the manifest injustice imposed upon labor by capital.

These public demonstrations of workingmen are quite common all over the country. They are prompted by the same motives. It is with them a question of bread, clothing, and shelter. They find their wages reduced to the lowest point and even beyond endurance.

I find in the New York Daily Tribune of February 3 last the following statements of one of these uprisings and the cause:

THE FALL RIVER STRIKE.

A dispatch from Fall River last night states that 8,000 cotton operatives have gone on a strike at that place, and that more may do so soon. The primary cause of this movement is a reduction in wages, which the men claim will make it impossible for them to earn more than $8 a week. They also assert that since 1874 wages in their trade have been reduced 41 per cent., and that there has seldom been a rise after a fall in wages.

It is true these strikes lost to the country, lost to the toilers and their families, millions of money. Let us learn from these strikes and their sacrifices that capital on the one hand, no matter how invested, and labor on the other, no matter how employed, should come together for the general good and prosperity. Let the laboring interests, furnishing the brain and muscle, the mental and physical energy, and capital, that builds and buys the shops, machinery, mines, and places of employment, unite on terms of equality for their mutual benefit.

As Representatives of the people we must not overlook this movement of the laboring masses to secure equality in the distribution of the necessary burdens of the Government. Our legislation must not confer special privileges, tending to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. We must wipe out all class legislation. Absolute equality can alone inspire that feeling of patriotism essential for the protection of our free institutions. Give us this, and our country will be filled with peace and plenty, virtue and safety. Affording the amplest scope and encouragement for frugal industry, we will find by the cotter's hearth, the shepherd's fold, on every farm, in all the workshops, by the wayside, and among all our laborers a love of country and devotion to our institutions which can only be found in a self-governed and well-governed nation.

At the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. GEDDES he yielded the remainder of his time to Mr. CONVERSE.

Mr. CONVERSE. I will reserve the time yielded me by my colleague, hoping to be able to add to it some further time which I may obtain from some other gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CONVERSE] is entitled to fifteen minutes of the time of his colleague.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SEYMOUR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message was received from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, joint resolution (H. Res. 236) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan two hundred flags to the city of Charlotte, N. C., for the celebration of the Mecklenburg declaration of independence.

TARIFF.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. TURNER, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before I enter upon the argument upon the tariff and bill under consideration I desire to reply briefly to the remarks of two of the leaders of this so-called "protective-tariff" system.

During this discussion upon the tariff Mr. CHACE, of Rhode Island, in his speech of April 16, and the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] in his speech of April 15, both made personal reference to myself. They are both leaders of the protective-tariff party and Republicans. Mr. CHACE said he desired to inform me that trace-chains in England used by the farmers were worth 85 cents per pair and in this country 65 cents per pair. If this statement is true, instead of this being an argument in his favor for keeping the present high tax of 47 per cent. duty on trace-chains, it shows conclusively that there is no necessity whatever for any tariff duty on chains to protect American capitalist or labor and that they ought to be put upon the free-list, for they yield comparatively no revenue. This is a clear proposition, for if chains are worth 20 cents a pair more in England than in the United States, made with such cheap labor as Mr. KELLEY described, in the name of reason and common sense why impose on them any duty at all, especially when the importer has to pay the freight and insurance across the ocean and add it to the cost of the chains?

Mr. KELLEY, who has been a member of this House for over twenty years, coming here on the unjust doctrine of not only taxing trace-chains but every article made of iron used by the farmers and laborers, also all their clothing, hats, shoes, blankets, and all they use or wear, and who never fails to take the floor when iron of any sort is mentioned, said he wanted to inform me that trace-chains were made by poor women in England, who only got 25 cents a day, and had to pay out of that for the forge and fuel and bringing the rods to the forge. Now, if that be true, how does it come that these chains are worth 20 cents more in England? What becomes of his protective theories if the laborer in free-trade England gets more for chains than here under his protective tariff? If the protective tariff cheapens chains here, why do the manufacturers want a high tariff of 47 per cent. kept up on them? I want these two protective-tariff leaders to settle this question between them.

Mr. Chairman, at the last session, after a warm debate and much opposition in a Republican House, we reduced the duty on chains from 58 to 47 per cent.; and three days after printed protests were put upon our desks from the chain manufacturers, stating that unless we restored the duty of 58 per cent. this country would be flooded with English chains. Such are the gross inconsistencies of these manufacturers and their advocates on this floor. But when it comes to action they all want a high duty, thus demonstrating the insincerity and fallacy of their positions and showing that those manufacturers are all realizing large profits by reason of the tariff, all coming out of the farmers and those who use these chains. The Treasury gets no revenue, because the duty is prohibitive, and it might as well be 100 per cent. as 47 per cent.—both exclude the importation and prevent competition. And what difference is it whether you drown a man in forty-seven feet of water or one hundred feet? The effect is the same.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania reached a climax and said he hoped no Kentucky girl or woman would ever have to work at such unwomanly work as making chains at such starvation wages. I say to the gentleman that he need not waste his sympathy on English women, for they have to pay no tax on their clothing and the necessaries of life; but if they were here, under the system that he advocates, they would have to pay out of their small wages a tariff tax on every article of their clothing and all the necessaries of life.

As for Kentucky girls and women, they never expect to make trace-chains or do unwomanly work; they never have and never will as long as any Kentucky men are left to protect them. Kentucky girls and women expect no sympathy from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY], for they all know that under his doctrine of so-called protection all their clothing and everything they use is taxed, not to support the Government, but to enrich the iron lords and manufacturers. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] said in his imposing manner that I come here every Congress on the doctrine of free trace-chains. Mr. Chairman, why is it that the bill I offered to put trace-chains used by the farmers and teamsters on the free-list troubles and haunts these gentlemen so? I will tell you, sir. These gentlemen and the Republican party spent two months during the Forty-seventh Congress in debating the bill to give us a tariff commission. They acknowledged that the war tariff ought to be reduced, but contended that we must have a commission to aid us in reducing it. I knew there was no sincerity in these professions. I charged the fact that it was merely for delay that they might continue to draw their tribute from the toiling masses of the people. Many others charged the same thing.

To prove their insincerity and to demonstrate to the country that the Republican party was unwilling to give any relief to the farmers I moved to suspend the rules and pass a bill putting trace-chains on the free-list. Why? Because it would not affect the revenue, as there was little or no revenue collected on chains, and it would be of some small benefit to every farmer in the land. We demanded the yeas and nays.

The Republican members tried to prevent them, but the Democratic side of this House were strong enough and forced a yea-and-nay vote. The whole Republican party voted against giving even this small relief to the farmers, except two members. No excuse was left them, for the proposition was too simple to require a report from a "tariff commission." Their insincerity was exposed by that vote. The vote was incorporated in the Democratic campaign book, and was used by Democrats all over the United States in the canvass of 1883 at the fall elections. Those chains rattled over their heads at the elections, and many gentlemen were left at home who had voted against the bill, and this is why they are so uneasy about trace-chains and single me out.

Now, sir, I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania that I came here not as he says, but on a broader ground. I came on the doctrine of reducing the tariff taxation to a revenue standard. I came in opposition to the doctrine advocated by him—that you have the right to tax the great mass of the people to benefit a few manufacturers. I came here on the great principles of Democracy, and he knows I have advocated these principles and voted in accordance with them ever since I have been a member of this House. He has come here for many years—for what? To advocate the iron interest, and he has done it ably and well. I was sent here, sir, by no "ring," but by the untrammeled voice of the Democrats of the old Gibraltar district of Kentucky, the best Democrats in the world—the district that was represented here so long by that incorruptible patriot, Linn Boyd, who was twice Speaker of this House. I am from a district that has never faltered from the principles taught by Thomas Jefferson. I have great respect for the gentleman personally, but I differ from his views on taxation as wide as the poles. He comes here on the doctrine of the right to tax the whole people not for revenue, but to protect the manufacturers.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will pardon this digression. I must now proceed with the argument I shall make on this tariff question—the bill under consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I assert that there is no power under the Constitution of the United States to tax the people for any purpose other than to defray the expenses of the Government, economically administered. Yet here we sit with a high protective tariff imposed upon the country by the Republican party at the last session of Congress—not enacted into a law by the deliberate opinions of the Representatives of the people by the usual routine of legislation, but by a "conference report," rushed through Congress during the last three days of the last Congress, when this House was under the control of the Republican party, not for the purpose of revenue, but to add to the wealth of a small class of manufacturers and capitalists, to give them profits of from 25 to 100 per cent., while the farmers are only making 3½ or 4 per cent. on their capital and labor. Is this right? Is this just to our constituents? We have a Democratic majority in the House, and is it not our duty to pass a bill reducing tariff taxation? Is it not a violation of our pledges to the people to sit here and see this system of legalized robbery go on? Have we not declared in our national platforms that it was wrong to collect tariff duties beyond a revenue necessary for the support of the Government? Are we to sit here and do nothing to reduce the tariff taxation? If we do, I say it is criminal on our part. If there are those who will not act with us in reducing this unjust tariff taxation put upon the statute-books by the Republicans, and thus prevent us from giving relief to the farmers and the great mass of the people, let them go upon the record, and let the country know who is responsible for the continuance of this system of unjust taxation.

Mr. Chairman, I have attempted to do my duty in exposing this system and doing all that I could to reduce the tariff rates to a revenue standard. I have spoken against it and voted against it upon all proper occasions. I shall continue to do so as long as I am a Representative on this floor if this system is kept up.

TAX ON INCOMES.

I have advocated equalizing the burdens of taxation by imposing a tax on all net incomes over $5,000, and thereby making the millionaires who pay nothing for the protection of the Government of their millions bear some of the burdens of Federal taxation, and not leave the greater portion upon the farmers and laborers of the country; and I hope it may be done by this Congress. It is right and just. Why should the men who own United States bonds by the millions pay nothing on their immense incomes? They have had a long rest, and paid no taxes for over twenty years. What patriotic services have they rendered that they should be exempt from taxation? Why should they be the pets of this Government? They purchased these bonds at from 40 to 60 cents on the dollar, most of them, and have been drawing their interest in gold even when it was over 200 per cent. premium, and paying no tax on their bonds or incomes, while all that the farmer owns is taxed. Agriculture is the great fountain of our wealth, and it ought to be fostered; at least we ought to have even-handed justice dealt out to us. We ask no bonuses or bounties, but we demand a fair, equal, and just system of taxation.

Mr. Chairman, at this session of Congress I introduced a bill to equalize the burdens of taxation by taxing the incomes of those bondholders and millionaires by imposing a tax of 3 per cent. on net incomes over $5,000, 5 per cent. on incomes over $10,000, and 10 per cent. on incomes over $100,000. I do not contend by any means that that bill is perfect; the rates of taxation may be in the estimation of this House too great. I believe, sir, upon reflection, that the rate of taxation upon incomes ought to be greater on incomes over half a million, and still greater on incomes over one million, for such an aggregation of capital in the hands of one man is dangerous in a republican government; and, besides, the tax upon them would be light in comparison with those having small incomes.

But, sir, all these matters are for future consideration, for the Committee of Ways and Means to whom this bill has been referred.

Mr. Chairman, the object of that bill I believe meets the approbation of the Democratic members of this House, and I believe of the great mass of the people, judging from the comments of the press in the East, West, and South. Certainly no one can controvert the justice of the principle involved in compelling the millionaires to pay their proportion for the protection of the Government of their millions, especially when they have paid no tax on their bonds or incomes for over twenty years.

Mr. Chairman, I hope and urge upon the Committee on Ways and Means, to whom this bill was referred, to give it early consideration, and that they will report that bill back favorably that we may have a vote on it in this House, so that the burdens of taxation may be somewhat equalized and not have a favored class paying no taxes. A small tax on incomes of those who are able to pay it would yield from seventy-five to one hundred millions of dollars and would enable us to lighten the tax on articles of necessity used by the farmers and laboring classes.

Mr. Chairman, only think, sir, of our present system of taxation. Here are these protectionists clamoring to tax the great mass of the people to add to the great profits of the manufacturers; and not satisfied with that, they want to go further and exempt from taxation the immense fortunes and incomes of these iron lords and manufacturers. Sir, could there be greater injustice? I protest against it in the name of the people I represent, in the name of the tax-ridden masses of the country.

This iniquitous and unjust system of taxation has been kept up in the interest of the New England States and Pennsylvania for over twenty years, and strange, sir, that it has been kept up so long. The South and West have been paying the tribute annually to the East under the tariff laws and increasing these immense incomes built up by this system and exempted from Federal taxation. Sir, the people are learning their rights. The star of empire moves westward. We have now the power and the strength to correct this oppression. We demand no bounties, but ask for justice. Give us "equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none."

Mr. Chairman, the great vital question that interests the American people is the question of taxation. The total amount of revenue collected is $398,287,581. Of that sum $116,483,025 is collected upon whisky and tobacco—two articles that are not necessaries—and $210,637,293 is collected under the tariff system of taxation. There is no question better settled than that amount of taxation is not necessary to defray the expenses of the Government. The President has repeatedly told us in his messages that the revenue collected was too great, that it ought to be reduced and the taxes lessened. In his message of December, 1881, he said:

> In view, however, of the heavy load of taxation which our people have already borne we may well consider whether it is not the part of wisdom to reduce the revenues, even if we delay a little the payment of the debt. It seems to me that the time has arrived when the people may justly demand some relief from their present onerous burden, and that by due economy in the various branches of the public service this may be readily afforded.

In 1882 the President again recommended a reduction of the revenues or the taxation upon the people in his message in these words:

> I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. And though there have always been among our people wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th of June last the surplus was more than $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.
> It was made apparent, in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress, that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views, as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative, none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

Sir, this reads like the doctrine of the Democratic party. The President says "only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government." This sounds like the Democratic platform—"a tariff for revenue only"—which has been so often denounced by the Republicans on this floor and in the country.

The Republicans on this floor and in the Senate in 1882 were compelled in the debate on the Tariff Commission to acknowledge that the taxes were too high, and then instead of reducing the tariff taxation they postponed it by appointing the Tariff Commission. Sir, I and others charged then on this floor that there was no sincerity in their pledges to reduce the tariff taxation; that they only wanted delay, that the capitalists and manufacturers might continue to draw their annual tribute from the farmers and consumers of the country. Subsequent events have proved it.

The Secretary of the Treasury suggested in his report that the revenue was too much, and, sir, the $140,000,000 surplus in the Treasury demonstrates beyond controversy that the taxes are too high and ought to be reduced.

There are but few, I hope, that will have the bold effrontery to charge that the taxes on whisky and tobacco ought to be reduced and that the present high taxes on the blankets, woolen goods, and the necessaries of life used by the farmers and laborers in the land ought to be kept up.

Why, sir, even the tariff commissioners, taken from the high-protection tariff class, after traveling all over the country and examining the manufacturers themselves, were forced to recommend a reduction in the tariff taxation of 25 per cent.

The President in two consecutive messages recommended a reduction of the tariff taxation. The Secretary of the Treasury recommended it; the tariff commissioners, the appointees of the Republican party, recommended it; the people, the toiling masses, demanded it. Let us see what response has been made to these appeals by Congress. A Republican Congress met in December, 1882, and after spending nearly the whole session in an apparent effort to reduce the tariff taxation, with a bill in the Senate and one in the House, both for the avowed purpose of reducing the tariff, they brought their labors to a close on the 3d day of March, 1883; not by responding to the advice of the President and regarding the demands and wants of the people by a reduction of the tariff taxation adequate with the requirements of the Government and the wants of the toiling masses of the country, but they perpetrated an outrage and a fraud upon the tax-ridden people, not by an act of Congress, the deliberate judgment of both Houses, but by a "conference report," containing the present unjust tariff law. It was rushed through both Houses under a change of the rules, brought about by a Republican caucus without consideration. It was the most barefaced combination and legislative iniquity upon the rights of the people ever practiced in Congress. It was a fraud upon the rights of the people. It was a piece of deception which time has demonstrated.

Instead of reducing the tariff 45 per cent., as the conferees said it would, it increased the tariff taxation, where there were no disagreeing votes between the House and Senate, on large and important classes of goods; it increased the tax on cotton and woolen goods; it increased taxation on many articles used by the laboring classes beyond the Morrill war tariff, and yet we are modestly told not to disturb that iniquitous and unjust tariff enacted into a law in violation of every principle of justice and rightful legislation; that it would be impolitic to do so.

Sir, I say that the great mass of the people, the Democratic party, justice to those who have paid this tribute for over twenty years, all demand that this Democratic House shall reduce this system of legalized robbery. Mr. Chairman, what excuse could we make when we return home if we had made no attempt to relieve the people of this unjust system of taxation with an overflowing Treasury? Sir, it would be criminal on our part not to make the attempt; and as far as I am concerned I would vote to-day to reduce the tariff to a revenue standard, giving only such protection as that would afford, and it is enough. It is all the manufacturers have a right to ask under the Constitution of our country. Mr. Chairman, where is the clause in the Constitution which authorizes us to impose taxes upon the great mass of the people not for revenue, but to add to the wealth of a favored class? Sir, there is none.

Look, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, at some of the outrages perpetrated by this so-called "conference report" that the Republicans pretended would reduce the tariff taxation.

The Bureau of Statistics, the most correct authority, furnishes the following table:

JOSEPH NIMMO, JR., Chief of Bureau.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF STATISTICS, March 10, 1884.

This table shows that instead of a reduction of $3,681,000, as Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, said would result from the present tariff law on cotton goods, the tariff duty on cotton goods is increased $825,000 on the amount consumed last year, which was $37,970,610, besides the increase by reason of the tariff on the cotton goods manufactured in the United States, all of which is a bonus to the manufacturers and comes out of the pockets of the consumers, and amounts to millions.

The tables show that while the tariff on wool was reduced the tariff on woolen goods was increased over one million annually at the present rate of importation, and of course the enhanced price by reason of this tariff will be added by the manufacturers on the woolen goods manufactured in this country, which will amount to many millions, all to come out of the consumers and go not into the Treasury, but into the pockets of the manufacturers.

The tariff on silks and satins was reduced from 60 to 50 per cent., and the tariff on the cheap crockery ware used by the poor was increased. The clothing of the laborers of the country is taxed 25 per cent. higher by this conference law than it was under the war tariff. These are specimens of the relief they gave to the farmers and laborers of the country by this (I might say) conference fraud under the false pretense of reducing the tariff taxes. Sir, I have called this tariff system "robbery," and in doing so I am justified by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The Loan Association against Topeka, delivered by that able jurist, Judge Miller (20 Wallace, 657), in which the court say, defining the taxing power:

The power to tax is therefore the strongest, the most pervading of all the powers of the Government, reaching directly or indirectly to all classes of the people.

It was said by Chief-Justice Marshall, in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, that the power to tax is the power to destroy. A striking instance of the truth of the proposition is seen in the fact that the existing tax of 10 per cent. imposed by the United States on the circulation of all other banks than the national banks drove out of existence every State bank of circulation within a year of two after its passage. This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.

To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation. This is not legislation. It is a decree under legislative forms.

Nor is it taxation. A "tax," says Webster's Dictionary, "is a rate or sum of money assessed on the person or property of a citizen by government for the use of the nation or state." "Taxes are burdens or charges imposed by the legislature upon persons or property to raise money for public purposes."

Coulter, J., in Northern Liberties vs. St. John's Church, says, very forcibly:

I think the common mind has everywhere taken in the understanding that taxes are a public imposition, levied by authority of the government for the purpose of carrying on the government in all its machinery and operations; that they are imposed for a public purpose.

In this decision the court say:

To lay with one hand the power of the government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

The court further says in the same decision:

If it be said that a benefit results to the local public of a town by establishing manufactures, the same may be said of any other business or pursuit which employs capital or labor. The merchant, the mechanic, the inn-keeper, the banker, the builder, the steamboat-owner, are equally promoters of the public good and equally deserving the aid of the citizens by forced contributions. No line can be drawn in favor of the manufacturer which would not open the coffers of the public Treasury to the importunities of two-thirds of the business men of the city or town.

So I hope my Republican friends will not say that I use harsh and unwarranted denunciation when I denounce this whole system of tariff taxation as a system of "robbery" of the great masses of the people to enrich a favored class, the few manufacturers. Mr. Chairman, all taxation should be uniform and just to all classes and all sections and all industries. Instead of this, the American Congress by a system of tariff taxation has oppressed the agricultural interest of the country, compelling the farmer to pay large and enhanced prices for nearly all he consumes, and denying him the right to reap the full fruits of his labor by selling his products or exchanging them in the best markets of the world, and all for the purpose of enriching the manufacturers at the expense chiefly of the farmers, who comprise over one-half of the population of this country, and this iniquity is perpetrated by what is known as the "protective tariff," which I believe to be nothing but legalized robbery of the great mass of the people to enrich the few under the pretext of "protecting American labor."

Mr. Chairman, the great principle underlying our Government is "equal rights to all; exclusive privileges to none;" yet no people ever submitted to such oppressive taxation as we do, not to support the Government, but to enrich a small class who have put their capital in manufactories. I have no objection to a revenue tariff to support the Government, economically administered. This is the Democratic doctrine, and would be constitutional and right. The people must investigate this question for themselves, and when they understand the injustice of this so-called protective system they must rise in their majesty and shake off the shackles that have made the farmers of the great West and South slaves to enrich the manufacturers. They must fill the legislative halls of Congress with men who will trample under foot the monopolies which are controlling the legislation of this great country and wringing from the farmers and laborers about $1,500,000,000 annually, not for revenue, but a bonus to manufacturers, by this unjust tariff.

QUESTION OF THE DAY.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the great question of the day. It is one in which every honest laborer and agriculturist is interested, whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, white or black. It is an issue from which I do not shrink, and the Democratic party must not shrink if they want the confidence of the people and if they are true to their past platforms and principles with which we have in days gone by marched to victory. The people all over this great country demand relief, and speedy relief, from this serfdom which is grinding them down every day and making them poorer in spite of close economy and industry.

Mr. Chairman, let us examine this question fairly. What is the total value of the commodities imported into the United States from foreign countries upon which a tariff duty is imposed? In 1882 it was $505,491,967; in 1883, $493,916,384. What is the amount of tariff taxation imposed upon the importations of 1883? Under the tariff now in force, $210,637,293, which is an average of 42.65 per cent; in 1881 it was 43.25 per cent. Thus it will be seen that the reduction under the great relief measure given us at the last session of Congress by the Republican party amounted to almost nothing, and yet they acknowledged that the war tariff was too high, and their own tariff commissioners had recommended a reduction of 20 or 25 per cent.

Now, what is the total amount of goods consumed upon which a tariff duty is imposed? According to the last census it is about $4,000,000,000. Thus it makes the enhanced value of the commodities by reason of the tariff about one and a half billions, which is a bonus to the manufacturers, so that the consumers pay into the Treasury collected under the present tariff $210,637,293, and pay to the manufacturers a bonus of about one and a half billions in addition.

These figures are almost incredible, but yet they are true, and from this it can be seen why these manufacturers are reveling in wealth and luxury. In the East millionaires are so numerous as scarcely to attract attention. Magnificent palaces are on every hand, their tables groaning under the luxuries of every land, fine equipages and liveried servants, such as are seen in Eastern cities and at Newport, Saratoga, and other places of summer resort every year. They own millions upon millions of bonds. National banks are too numerous to mention.

How different is it in the West and South. With the richest country in the world, with close economy, with children kept at home from school to work, indulging in no costly luxuries, yet at the end of each year our farmers can barely make the ends meet after paying their taxes.

And, sir, this has been going on for over half a century. No wonder that you see the fine cities, colleges, and everything that is grand and costly in the East. But where, sir, did the money come from that produced this result? From the pockets of the toiling masses of this country; out of the honest farmers, lawyers, doctors, and laborers of the West and South, who have paid their yearly tribute to these manufacturers, collected in violation of justice and the Constitution of our country by this iniquitous tariff system, for it all comes out of the pockets of the consumer; and not only the tariff duty, but the cost of transportation across the ocean, with the profits of the merchant, as can be plainly demonstrated. If this annual tribute was collected by tax-gatherers the people would not stand it twelve months, but it is collected in an insidious way by the merchants, as I explained fully once before in discussing this question on this floor, and which I will repeat:

A foreign merchant brings from Europe a hat, a pair of shoes; he pays the tariff duty at the custom-house, and then offers them for sale in this country. What does he ask for them? He adds to the cost in Europe the transportation across the ocean, his profits, the tariff duty. The merchant from the West or South, who buys in the East, has all this to pay; he brings them home, adds on his profits and the transportation from New York, and sells them to the farmers and consumers. Then they have all this to pay; they buy the hats, the shoes, and other dutiable goods, and wear them out. Out of their pockets, then, comes the whole amount at last.

Sir, this is bad enough, but it is insignificant compared with the bonus paid the manufacturers. How do they collect their bonuses? Simply by putting their goods up to the price of the foreign article, adding on the tariff duty, the cost of transportation across the ocean, insurance, and profit, all of which the consumers have to pay. Thus the consumers have to pay this bonus of about $1,500,000,000 to the manufacturers and the $210,637,293 tariff duties collected and paid into the Treasury by the officers of the Government. To make it still plainer: A man in New York goes into a hat-store of imported hats; he buys one. What does he pay for it? He pays the cost in Europe, transportation, profit, and the tariff duty, say $2. This $2 goes into the Treasury. He crosses the street and buys a hat made in Massachusetts. What does he pay for it? Why, the same price, because the Yankee has added on the tariff duty; then the $2 goes into the Yankee's pocket instead of into the Treasury. And so it is with 2,000 articles upon which the tariff duties are imposed. How long will the American people stand this robbery?

Mr. Chairman, of the $210,637,293 collected and paid into the Treasury upon foreign goods imported $134,557,435.69 are collected on six articles, as follows:

Sugar and molasses	$46,172,378 85
Woolen goods and wool	32,320,892 52
Iron and steel	16,590,563 93
Silk goods	19,654,946 28
Cotton goods	12,234,371 24
Flax and linen	7,584,342 87
Total on the six articles	134,557,435 69

It requires the duty on all the remaining long list of over 1,900 articles to make up the remaining $86,079,857.31 of tariff duties that goes into the Treasury, because the tariff duty is so high on all the other articles but little is imported. The tariff on most of them is almost prohibitory, and therefore the manufacturer can charge what he pleases on them.

Such is the injustice of this tariff, made to rob the farmers and other consumers for the benefit of a few manufacturers and not for revenue.

INJUSTICE OF THE TARIFF.

One of the worst features of this odious tariff is that the necessaries of life and the articles used by the poor are taxed the highest, as will be seen from a few articles which I have selected. Thus while cut-glass, used only by the wealthy, pays a tariff duty of only 40 per cent., the common window-glass, used by the poor, is taxed 45 per cent. The velvets and laces used by the wealthy are only taxed 40 per cent., and the common flannel to protect the laboring man and his wife and children from the cold of winter are taxed 69 per cent.; coarse blankets taxed 69 per cent., while broadcloth is only taxed 66 per cent. Medicines for the sick are taxed from 15 to 237 per cent., while raisins, figs, and confections are taxed only 29, 35, and 55 per cent. respectively, and champagne wine 56 per cent. Under the present tariff the poor people pay nearly double as much as the wealthy, because the duty is so much higher on the articles used by the poor laboring class than the rich, and yet the incomes of the millionaires pay no tax and have not for years. Is this justice? Ought such a system to be kept up?

Mr. Chairman, of the population of the United States over 40,000,000 are consumers not engaged in manufactories, and only about 12,000,000 are engaged in manufactories; this includes the families of the operatives. Sir, of this number not more than 3 per cent. get the immense profits from manufactories, and these immense bonuses or bounties, because the operatives have to live; they consume the necessaries of life upon which the tariff duties are imposed, like other laborers. And although nominally they may be receiving good wages, yet their wages are taken out of their pockets by the enormous duties imposed upon their clothing and the necessaries of life that they consume.

The capitalists who own the manufactories are the only beneficiaries under the tariff and reap the benefits or increased price by reason of the tariff taxation. They are pocketing an annual profit of from 20 to 60 per cent., and the poor operatives are bled by the tariff in common with the farmers of the country. Why should 45,000,000 of people be taxed under the tariff laws for the benefit of the capitalists, who see proper to run manufactories that are fully developed and competent to sustain themselves in fair competition with Europe, especially when they have the ocean across which most of the raw material has to go and then come back after it is manufactured before it is offered for sale here?

The manufacturers have no moral or legal right to claim bounties from the farmers, merchants, lawyers, doctors, mechanics, and laborers to enrich them. If there ever was any just reason for it, it has ceased to exist; for they have had protection or bounties long enough. A continuance of the tariff at a higher rate than is necessary to defray the expenses of the Government is simply the taxation of the whole people to add to the wealth of a few, to build up, as it has done, a favored aristocracy in violation of the spirit of our institutions. I protest against it, sir, in the name of justice and the people whom I have the honor to represent.

Now let us see the amount of capital engaged in agriculture. According to the last census, total value of farms, $10,197,094,805; total value of farming implements, $406,522,364; total value of live-stock, $1,500,494,607; total amount invested in agriculture, $12,104,111,776.

The farmers are not realizing more than 3 or 3½ per cent. net, while the manufacturers are realizing from 30 to 60 per cent. I mean the capitalists who own the factories, not the poor operatives.

Sir, is it just, is it right, that the agriculturist should be discriminated against? Where is the protection given the farmer? Where is the protection given labor on the farm? There is none. We ask none. All the farmer demands is equality under the law, and he has a right to it. We are not even allowed to sell our tobacco to any one unless he is licensed and taxed by the Government.

Sir, I have been a farmer all my life, and I have felt and understood the injustice done the farmers of the country and the burdens imposed unjustly upon them and the doctors, lawyers, artisans, and laborers of the land by this unjust protective tariff system.

But, sir, we hear the continual cry that this unjust tariff system is necessary to "protect American labor." It is not true. It is a deception and a fraud upon the rights of the great mass of the people. Under what clause of the Constitution do you find the power to tax the honest farmer, to take from him the fruits of his hard labor and put it in the pocket of the manufacturer to enhance the value of his labor? Give us equal rights. You have no right to tax 45,000,000 of our people to enrich 5,000,000—no, only one and a half millions, for the operatives do not get the profit or bonus. We live in a country abounding in the raw material, the iron, coal, cotton, at our very doors.

The broad ocean across which the manufactures of Europe have to come gives you all the protection you need or ought to have. You have been protected in your infancy; you have grown to manhood; and do not keep up your cry for "protection." You have most of the banking capital; you have the bonds; you got them for 40 cents to 60 cents on the dollar; and in God's name you ought to be satisfied. If some manufactories will not pay, why, you have no right, legal or moral, to tax others to keep them up. But, gentlemen, you know that they will pay; you know that they ship plows to England and machinery of various kinds and sell them lower than they do here, and then make a fair profit. You know that while we only make 3½ or 4 per cent. in agriculture, your iron lords are realizing 30 and 60 per cent., and that you are making an average of over 30 per cent. on all manufactured commodities; but you are not satisfied, and the American people will have to rise in their might and assert their birthright to be free. The shackles of slavery have been struck from the African, yet you hold in slavery the white men of the country, the toiling masses, and compel them to pay you tribute on the necessaries of life, and deny to them the right to exchange the fruits of their labor for the commodities they need in the markets of the world. It is an outrage.

HOW IS THIS UNJUST SYSTEM OF TAXATION KEPT UP?

But Mr. Chairman, I may be asked, How is this unjust tariff system kept up? In the first place, it was enacted, as I said before, during the war under a false pretense to fill the Treasury, and ever since then it has been kept up by "rings and cliques" who were in the interest of the manufacturers and monopolists, and who sent members here who have disregarded the interest of the farmers and consumers in many instances. They have not represented the interest of the great mass of the people. Then these capitalists fill the corridors of this Capitol and the hotels with lobbyists, all in their interests. The honest farmers in the country are at home; they have neither the time nor the money to spend in coming here to see to their interests, and they are disregarded by members who are true to the interests of the capitalists, who had them nominated in conventions in which the great mass of the people had no voice.

And lastly, any reform in this tariff has been prevented by the rules of this House. In this way every bill has to be referred under the rules to a committee, and no vote can be taken on it until the committee reports the bill back to the House, either favorably or unfavorably. Many bills have been introduced looking to relief from this odious tariff by various members. I have introduced several myself during the Forty-sixth Congress and Forty-seventh Congress and during this session. What became of them? They were referred under the rules to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that committee, in violation of the spirit of the rules of this House, pocketed these bills and refused to report them in any way at all, either favorably or unfavorably, and thus they prevented a vote upon those bills of relief to the people.

I offered bills to abolish the tariff duty on all agricultural implements, a bill to repeal the tax on leaf-tobacco, a bill to put trace-chains on the free-list. What has become of them? They sleep the sleep of death in this star chamber, and there is no power under the rules of this House to resurrect them. There is no way to force this committee to report these bills. Why do they not report these bills back with an adverse report, if the committee is opposed to them? Because they would then go on the Calendar and we could have a vote on them. Members would then be brought face to face with their constituents, and they would have to vote for these bills or an indignant constituency would consign them to private life, and send men here who would represent their true interest.

Look, Mr. Chairman, for example, at the bill to put trace-chains on the free-list. Upon trace-chains there is a duty of 47 per cent., which amounts to almost a prohibition, for the whole amount of revenue collected upon trace-chains, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Revenue, is only $1,500 in a year. Yet it is an article used by every farmer in the land and every teamster, and by virtue of this tariff millions go into the pockets of the manufacturers of chains every year as a bonus. Would any man representing an agricultural district face his constituents on the record and vote against that bill which would give the farmers free trace-chains? It would do the Treasury no harm, because the revenue is only a mere pittance, $1,500; and yet, sir, I introduced that bill during the Forty-sixth Congress, and the Ways and Means Committee had that bill during the last two sessions of the Forty-sixth Congress, and have had it during the Forty-seventh Congress and ever since the first bill day of this Congress, when I introduced it again, now four months ago, and will not make a report of the bill, either favorable or unfavorable, because it would then be in the power of a majority of this House to vote on this and similar bills.

Mr. Chairman, is it not an outrage upon the rights of the people that such an abuse of power should exist and yet no remedy provided against it? For there is none, unless you could get a two-thirds vote and pass a bill or resolution under a suspension of the rules. But, sir, a majority ought to rule in a republican government; but it is powerless here. A majority can not force from that committee the many bills that have been referred to it for the relief of the farmers and consumers of this country. Seeing this defect in the new rules when they were reported from the committee that formed the new rules of this House, I offered an amendment to force a committee to report on a bill after they had had it for thirty days and refused to report it back to the House by putting it in the power of the member offering the bill to move to discharge the committee who had had it thirty days and to give the House the right to vote on the bill, when a majority could pass it if they thought proper.

But, sir, that amendment was defeated after it had been advocated by myself and others, as will be seen by a reference to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, pages 1085 to 1089. Who defeated it? Why, the protective-tariff men; those men who are willing to tax the masses to enrich the few. They were the men who voted against the amendment for this evil that exists today and puts it in the power of any committee to defeat the will of a majority of the Representatives on this floor simply by refusing to report back a bill referred to them.

Sir, ought such an outrage to be tolerated in a free country, a land of boasted freedom, when seven men in the Congress of the United States can prevent the passage of a bill giving a relief to the people, although a large majority may desire to vote for the bill? It is worse than despotism. Yet such is the case under the rules of this House. It is right that this House and the country should understand this question, and therefore I have attempted to expose it in the hope that a remedy may be provided to force a committee to report a bill back to this House that has been referred to them. Personally I like and respect the members of that committee; but, sir, I felt that it was my duty to expose this grievance that has riveted upon the people this odious tariff and has prevented even a modification of parts of it in former sessions of Congress.

Mr. Chairman, Senator BECK assigns the following additional means by which this tariff system is kept up. He said:

> Mr. President, the truth is, that protectionists at last believe that they can control the legislation of the Government, and not only hold on to the subsidies they now receive, but many of them clamor for more. Their organizations are perfect, and ramify every part of the country. They elect or defeat Senators and Representatives in many places, as they think best for their interest; they own a powerful and intelligent portion of the public press; they can afford to spend and squander hundreds of millions rather than have their privileges curtailed or their bounties diminished. They have their operatives, many of them very intelligent men, so dependent upon them for the support of their families that they can, by threats of reducing their wages, if Congress dares to reduce their subsidies, make the workmen, against their interest, and often against their will, protest vigorously by petition and otherwise against all reduction of taxation. Dismissal from position follows a refusal to vote and protest as they are expected and often ordered to do. They move like well-trained veterans in every contest, knowing that the tax-paying masses have no combinations, and can have none, no hired press, and no paid advocates. The protectionists are as trained regulars in a conflict with raw militia. Union is strength; wealth is power, and a common interest is a strong bond of union.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now to show to the country and this committee that the very States in the East that are now so clamorous for protection, at one time, when they were impartial judges, entertained and expressed the views in regard to the protective tariff that I have to-day. They not only contended that the whole system was wrong and unjust, but that it was unconstitutional. They manifested their views in memorials to Congress, in public resolutions, and in conventions, all of which denounced this odious and unjust system, and I will now refer to some of those memorials and resolutions, which I have referred to before, and to which I invite the attention of the committee.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the advocates for protection will be driven to say these are old arguments. But, sir, this is no answer. The Constitution is the same in this respect that it was then; the eternal principles of justice are the same now that they were then, and the reasons are more forcible to-day than they were then, for they were protesting against a low tariff on but few articles, while now we have a tariff of an average of about 41 per cent. and on about 2,000 articles.

In November, 1820, Mr. Kinsley presented to the Sixteenth Congress a memorial from Belfast, in the State of Maine, protesting against any further protection to the manufacturing interest of the country. In the same year, in the month of December, Mr. Whitman presented to Congress a memorial from a convention of delegates from the agricultural and commercial sections of the State of Maine, assembled at Portland, asking that no such tariff be adopted as was proposed at the former Congress (which was a low tariff on a few articles), in which, after presenting an elaborate argument against a protective tariff, they use this language (see Annals of Sixteenth Congress, page 1495):

Your memorialists have not been led to these remarks by any thing like hostility to the manufacturing interests. They are, on the contrary, decidedly in favor of all reasonable encouragement to promote, uphold, and cherish every thing of that kind.

But your memorialists had never dreamed it would ever be considered necessary or proper that all other interests should be made to yield as secondary and tributary to that alone. They are sure this was not the original design of the framers of the Constitution. In that instrument we find nothing about manufactures.

They, however, have pressed into their service an elaborate essay of the celebrated Alexander Hamilton on this subject. They have adopted his principles, but disregard their application. He insisted on the encouragement of manufactures so far as might be consistent with a due regard to commerce and the collection of revenue. The duties now are nearly treble what they were when he wrote, and, on an average, higher by 100 per cent. than he, in the height of his zeal for manufactures, ever recommended.

In the case of iron, the duty on which was not half what it now is, he recommended a diminution, under an idea that it was almost a raw material, necessary in every kind of mechanism; and the same with regard to molasses, which we could ourselves distill. At the time he wrote it was necessary to urge with great vehemence upon the attention of Congress this subject of encouraging manufactures in order to have it attended to, so far as might be compatible with the other great interests of the community. But he could not have foreseen this abuse and perversion of his reasoning. He never could have imagined that the time would come when it would be deemed good policy to make the people pay from 30 to 100 per cent. more for goods to the manufacturer than they might otherwise be bought for of the importing merchant.

Your memorialists believe the duties now imposed on foreign manufactures to be fully adequate to any reasonable demand on the part of the American manufacturer. All the cotton and woolen manufactories which have been providently established and well managed are perfectly satisfied with the present rate of duties. From these we hear no complaint; and they are considerably numerous in the Northern and Eastern States. All such as were established without judgment, without capital, and without the aid of any skill whatever have of course moldered into ruin. Such it can not comport with the wisdom or policy of Government to attempt to revive and uphold.

Your memorialists believe that the excitement in favor of manufacturers has had its origin rather in the improvidence and rash enterprise of some of our fellow-citizens than in any well-grounded cause of complaint. It may be that between 1812 and 1815 a state of things existed which induced individuals, in great numbers even, to plunge inconsiderately into extravagant and wild schemes in relation to manufactures. But it does not follow that the Government is, at all hazards, bound to uphold, protect, and save them from ruin.

They close that memorial with the following forcible language:

The situation of this country is in no wise similar to that of Great Britain. We have no surplus population that can not be retained but by such means. We have vacant territory without limit, and almost without price, inviting cultivation. There they must manufacture or emigrate. And notwithstanding the utmost of their exertions to find employment for their laboring poor, every seventh individual is a pauper and dependent on charity. In this country, as yet, it is not even every hundredth individual that is a subject of charity, and many centuries may elapse before the proportion will be greater, if this manufacturing mania can be kept within bounds.

* * * * * * *

The effect of an extraordinary action is to produce reaction. If the manufacturers should now succeed the consequence will be a deficit in the revenue. A direct tax must ensue, irritation will be produced, and by the time the manufacturers shall have got their great establishments in operation a new tariff will be enacted with a view to revenue solely. When the tariff was settled in 1816 the manufacturers were duly represented. The then Secretary of the Treasury was from the city of Philadelphia, and partook, it is believed, of all the feelings of the people upon this subject. At any rate, he recommended the tariff at that time with an express view to manufactures, and his recommendations, so far as they affected manufactures, in every instance, it is understood, except in relation to iron, were implicitly adopted. At that time the manufacturers, excepting those of iron, were perfectly satisfied, and in 1818, at the instance of the manufacturers, the duty on iron was increased from $9 to $15 per ton. They at the same time requested that the duty of 25 per cent. on cotton and woolen goods, which had been limited to five years, might be made perpetual. In this also they were gratified. Your memorialists expected to have heard no more from the manufacturers about further protecting duties. But the stride they are now contemplating is, to your memorialists, truly astonishing. Nothing now will satisfy them short of $25 per ton upon iron, an article necessary in every piece of mechanism; 35 per cent. upon printed books, by way, it may be presumed, of discouraging science; 10 cents per gallon on molasses, to protect the distillers of whisky; 33½ per cent. upon cotton and woolen goods, and so upon other manufactured articles in proportion, and, to crown all, cash payment without credit for duties!

* * * * * * *

Your memorialists have thus, with the characteristic frankness of fellow-citizens, intimated some of their views and feelings on this all-important subject. Their destinies are in the power of the National Government, on whose wisdom and justice they trust they can rely. It is for Congress to determine whether the great interests of the nation, on which depend its power, its glory, and its resources, shall be sacrificed to the cupidity of a handful of improvident and speculating manufacturers.

Signed by order and in behalf of the convention.

ARTHUR McCLELLAN, Chairman.
HENRY CLARKE, Secretary.

In same year another able memorial of a convention of delegates from Pennsylvania, assembled in Philadelphia, was presented to Congress, containing a full review of the protective-tariff system, and showing its injurious effects, part of which I will read, and regret that I can not read the whole of it, which is as follows:

Once admit that Congress may use the power of taxing imports ad libitum for any other purpose than that of revenue, and you give them, in reality, the power to say to the citizens of these United States, "You must devote yourselves to agriculture, commerce, or manufactures, not as you may happen to be inclined, but according to our sovereign will and pleasure." Let it never be forgotten that the question now about to be determined is not so much what may be beneficial to manufacturers, as whether Government has a right to benefit them to the manifest injury both of the agricultural and commercial classes; whether the constitutional provision against taxing exports can be rendered in a great measure nugatory by diminishing at pleasure the value of our exportable commodities through the instrumentality of a tax upon imports; and, finally, whether the direction and employment of individual capital are matters to be regulated and controlled by individual choice or by the will of the National Legislature.

If it be asked who are the rightful judges in regard to the expediency and justice of the proposed tariff, it is surely fair to answer that the payers, who constitute a very large majority of the whole nation, are certainly more competent to decide than the expectant receivers, when the only inquiry is, how much of the money of the former shall be paid to the latter, and to what extent it shall be taken not only without their consent, but in opposition both to their entreaties and remonstrances. This is the plain, unvarnished state of the case; and let sophists and casuists disguise it as they may, still, whenever it is contemplated, unadorned by the embellishments of geographical parties, and divested of the exaggerations of exclusive interests, it will be seen as a case where, on the one hand, a certain portion only of manufacturers (for very many of them are opposed to it) are importuning the Government to compel all the commercial and agricultural classes to buy their manufactures at enhanced prices or to go without; while, on the other hand, the sons of commerce and agriculture, almost to a man, are begging that they may not be exposed to any such exaction.

I wish that my time would permit me to read this whole memorial, for it presents unanswerable arguments. I wish that it could be read by every man on this continent.

I will now invite the attention of the committee to a unanimous report made by the Committee on Agriculture to the Sixteenth Congress, 1820. The committee was composed of Mr. Forrest, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Claggett, of New Hampshire; Mr. Meech, of Vermont; Mr. Richmond, of New York; Mr. Ringgold, of Maryland; Mr. Garnett, of Virginia, and Mr. Earle, of South Carolina. That able committee, after an examination of the protective-tariff system, made an elaborate report against the system, from which I will read the following extracts, page 1673, Annals of Congress, same book:

To propose to increase the wealth of the nation by increasing its taxes is enough to revolt the understandings of ordinary men; yet it seems that a mode of doing this has been discovered, and that the whole mystery lies in calling that which was before called tax—tariff. In the opinion of the committee it is the worst kind of tax, carried to the extent that is proposed; and it would be much better to raise a sum of money by direct taxes at once and distribute it in bounties among the manufacturers. We should then escape at least some of the oppressive effects of the system.

And again the committee says:

If the view that has been taken of the manufacturing system be correct, it must not only diminish the amount of national wealth, but must distribute it very unequally. This is by far the worst effect of the two. It taxes one class for the support of another, and, what is worse, taxes the poor for the sake of the rich. It thus produces that inequality which is the bane of republics; for it is, in fact, the influence of the few, or, in other words, aristocracy.

Now, though no just government will interfere by sumptuary laws to restrain the acquisition of wealth and thereby prevent inequality, so neither will any just government, by fostering particular interests at the expense of others, promote inequality. This is the opposite and the worst extreme of sumptuary laws. Nor is the inequality which is produced by the interference of the law by any means as harmless as that which results from different dispositions and different capacities in human beings. While the one may act as a salutary stimulus to industry, and its worst qualities are continually neutralized by the alienation and division of property, the other, by creating distrust in the government, produces despair and depresses industry; and the dread of retributive justice, which always accompanies wealth unjustly acquired, so far from giving rise to division of property, inevitably leads to concentration and primogeniture, to legal safeguards, corporations, charities, monopolies, and privileged orders.

The fear that the law which has given may also take away produces the necessity of usurping the law-making power. An alliance between the privileged classes is the inevitable consequence; hence a new accumulation of powers, new pretexts, and new means of oppressing the people. The Government must be rewarded for its protection by an increase of power, patronage, salaries, taxes, and a diminution of responsibility. The various Departments of the Government will no longer move in their appointed spheres, but usurp each other's authority. The State sovereignties will be merged in the General Government, and the legislative authority in the Executive. Such is the natural consequence of creating separate interests by law; such is the effect of that inequality which is produced by the interference of the law with individual wealth; such the process by which free governments are metamorphosed into aristocracies.

This is true, and we have already realized part of the picture, and I hope we may pause before we realize the remainder.

Again the committee says (page 1679, same book):

It is believed that no candid mind can fail to perceive that the effect of the manufacturing and its kindred systems will be to transfer a great portion of the wealth of the agriculturists to the other classes. If wealth is thus transferred, so are the means of education, of knowledge, and consequently of power. This is a subject which demands the serious attention of every agriculturist in the Union.

* * * * * * *

The great influence which the manufacturers, scattered as they will be over the whole face of the country, must acquire, will leave the agriculturists little hope that if they once assent to their system it will ever be revoked. Among the means by which their influence in the Government must be increased, the facility which they must derive from our popular modes of election, of directing the suffrages of the persons they employ, is not the least worthy of consideration.

Again the committee says, in regard to the constitutional power of Congress (page 1679):

Passing over those constitutional objections which admit of being urged with great force, that Congress can not lay taxes but for the purpose of revenue, and that this system is equally incompatible with that part of the Constitution which prescribes uniformity of imposts, and with that which forbids taxes on exportation, they will appeal only to that sacred spirit of justice which we all equally venerate and the authority of which we equally acknowledge; and they ask, in the name of that justice, whether it is possible to believe that the Congress of the United States can, without violating every principle on which our republican system is founded, tax one class of the community for the support of another; whether they can debar a man the use of the faculties he has derived from nature; compel him to abandon an occupation to which he has devoted his life and which he understands and to pursue another which he does not understand; whether it can take away the fruits of one man's industry, earned by the sweat of his brow, and bestow them on another who has not earned them? No legislature, much less a limited one, has any such right.

Those who become parties to government can not be supposed to agree to any other exactions than such as are necessary to defray its just expenses, and to preserve public order and morals. Even, therefore, if it could be made to appear that the effect of the system would be to augment the whole wealth of the nation, this object could not justify a legislature in taxing particular classes, without their consent, for the benefit of the whole. The object of government is to secure men in the exercise of their faculties, not to restrain or direct them; to secure them in the full and free enjoyment and control of their property, and not to distribute and regulate it by its own arbitrary will. It never could have entered into the contemplation of the States when they agreed to the Constitution that the General Government had a right by its legislation to change their mutual relations toward each other; to enrich one and impoverish another; to strengthen one and weaken another; and to impair, and perhaps ultimately destroy, the wealth, freedom, and happiness of them all.

The committee concludes its report by the following prophetic words, written in 1820 by those patriotic men representing in part the very country now clamoring for "protection of American industry," so called:

The people of these States, like the three great occupations that employ them, are united by the strongest ties of reciprocal interest. They feel a just pride in the inheritance bequeathed to them by their ancestors, their common freedom and glory; and they equally appreciate the blessings which they derive from that union, which is the result of their mutual exertions, and which it is mutually their interest to preserve. But these blessings must be seriously impaired without the cultivation of good will and the undeviating exercise of justice toward each other. It is by this means only that the temple of our Union can be cemented and consolidated, and that we can preserve it from the fate which the dissoluble fabrics of other governments have shared.

The committee believe that nothing can have a greater tendency to diminish our confidence in the Government of the Union and to impair our affection for it than all those measures which distribute its advantages partially and unequally. They believe that such will pre-eminently be the effect of the manufacturing system as proposed by the tariff bill that has been reported, and they fear that this is only the commencement of the system; not that they attribute any unfriendly designs or impure motives to its friends, but that the same reasoning which has begun the policy will dictate its continuance, and that the unsuccessful issue of every effort will be an argument, not for abandoning it, but for making a new attempt.

Sir, we have seen a verification of this at this session of Congress and are witnessing it to-day. Although over half a century has elapsed, although the tariff duties have been doubled and imposed on about 2,000 articles, although the manufactories have grown from infancy to manhood, yet they are trying to prevent a reduction of the tariff duties in every way.

I will now invite the attention of the committee to the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York against a protective tariff. It was presented to Congress February 9, 1824. I will read a few extracts from it:

The ship-builder, the carpenter, the blacksmith, the rope-maker, the dyer, the hatter, the shoemaker, the saddler, the machinist, with every other class of mechanics, and all the laboring classes of the community are identified with the merchant and the farmer. Their interests can not be promoted by an enormous duty on hemp, iron, and wool, or by laws which discourage commerce and navigation. They are the great consumers of the country, and it can not be supposed that a statute which adds to the price of every article of their clothing, of every agricultural implement, every tool used in their various trades, should be acceptable to them, especially if intended to give still further benefits to a class of citizens which has already received its full share of the protection and patronage of the Government.

Your memorialists have always believed that the true and legitimate object of taxation is revenue, and that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, and imposts," which is given to Congress by the Constitution of the United States, was not granted with the intention, nor will it bear the construction, that it may be so exercised as to cherish and elevate one class at the expense of all the other classes of our citizens. The Constitution imposes on Congress the great duty of "promoting the general welfare." To lay taxes which will operate as prohibitions and restrictions on trade, which will promote exclusive interests at the national expense, which impose heavy burdens on the many, and give to the few the benefits of a monopoly, can not be consistent with that sacred duty.

* * * * * * *

Another feature of the bill before your honorable body is equally partial and impolitic. The Constitution of the United States was instituted not only to "form a more perfect union," but to "establish justice" and "promote the general welfare." Hence, the burdens on the people should be as equally distributed as possible, and laws which impose taxes having a sectional bearing ought to be carefully avoided. It is well known that in a number of the States of our Federal Union there are few or no manufactories, and that the inhabitants of those States are almost exclusively agriculturists. Is it just, is it politic, will it contribute to promote those feelings of common interest and mutual kindness on which this Union was founded and which are its strongest cement, to lay onerous duties on the consumption of the inhabitants of those States, in order to establish great workshops in other parts of our country?

* * * * * * *

These sentiments, while they are sincerely entertained, are at the same time perfectly consistent with the opinion that the manufacturer has no more right to the favor and protection of his government than the farmer, the mechanic, the navigator, or the merchant.

* * * * * * *

NEW YORK, January 30, 1824. WILLIAM BAYARD, President.

This memorial was presented to the Eighteenth Congress, and was a protest against a tariff not half as unjust as the present tariff, and which some gentlemen desire to continue.

I will read an extract from the memorial of the Philadelphia Chamber of Commerce in 1824, that was presented to the Eighteenth Congress. It says:

But, above all, will the influence of the new tariff be prejudicial to the interest of the agricultural States? This interest is one with which your memorialists may be thought to have no intimate concern, since their personal relations are exclusively with commerce; but the wealth, the harmony, the deviations of this great Republic are interesting to all its citizens, and they who wish, as your memorialists do, that it may be perpetual, must wish to see it administered upon principles of impartial justice to all, by which alone its perpetuity can be secured. What will be the effect of a prohibition of foreign merchandise as extensive as that now to be effected by an immediate reduction in value of the labor and capital of the cultivator to the whole extent of the increased price that he must give for the American manufacture? The evil to him is without compensation; the value of his crops he loses precisely to the extent in which the manufacturer gains; he has no means of warding off or breaking the blow. His capital is inconvertible—it is fixed forever in the one employment of agriculture. He can not participate in the golden harvest of manufactures, if it is to be a golden harvest. His habits, his situation, his working hands, are all unfit for the loom and the spindle. He has heretofore sold for as much as he could and bought for as little as he could and at such markets as he pleased, in the enjoyment of that liberty which was the great end of the Constitution. He is hereafter to buy in one market only, at such prices as a market without foreign competition will charge; and he may sell as he can, when foreign nations shall act upon the principle of taking no more from us than we do from them.

* * * * * * *

They can not believe that commerce and agriculture are to sink into insignificance, and that manufactures, like Aaron's rod, are to swallow them both up.

I will now read an extract from the remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, adopted February, 1824, and presented to the Eighteenth Congress:

The tiring and ironing of carts, wagons, plows, and harrows of the Northern farmer his chains, his hoes, shovels, spades, scythes, &c., are made mostly of foreign iron. He can not move in winter and no considerable distance in summer unless his horses and oxen are shod with iron and calked with steel. The quantity of foreign iron used in the single item of shoeing horses and oxen in this section of the country is not inconsiderable. Is it not, then, unequal and unjust that the Northern farmer should pay such an enormous tax on iron, which is to him an article of first necessity?

Much of the foreign iron imported into the United States is used in the construction of machinery and in the manufacture of nails. Bar-iron is emphatically a raw material to almost every other manufacturer except the maker of bar-iron. Iron and steel are the chief materials used in all manufactures of hardware and in fabricating the implements used in all mechanical employments. These metals are principally used and are incomparably more expensive than all other materials which are made use of in erecting the machinery employed in manufacturing cotton and woolen goods. In short, almost all tools and a great proportion of all machinery are made of these metals. Encourage other manufactures by affording to every part of the country the greatest facility in obtaining bar-iron, and you will create a demand for bar-iron; but discourage other manufactures by making bar-iron scarce and dear, and you will in a great degree destroy the demands for bar-iron itself.

A very considerable portion of the foreign iron brought into this country is used in ship-building. If such duties are imposed on iron and hemp as will cause these articles to cost nearly twice as much in this country as they cost in other countries, how is the American merchant to compete with the merchants of other countries in building and navigating ships, the former discriminating duty on foreign tonnage being almost entirely abolished?

In answer to all this the wealthy proprietors of the iron mines in the interior of Pennsylvania will reply and say, indeed, they have already said: "Let the New England people come to us for iron to shoe their horses, build their ships, and carry on their manufactures. We own ore enough to make a sufficiency of iron to supply all America, and it is a shame that it should lie dormant. We want an income from it. We will sell them as much ore for $15 or $20 as will make a ton of iron, provided they will come and dig it out of the earth and refine it. Let the Eastern people come here and make their iron, or employ somebody to do it. We have a fine productive soil, also, and can supply them with provisions while they are thus employed. In this way a market will be created at home for our surplus produce, and we shall then be rich and independent. Then money will not be sent out of the country to purchase foreign iron and encourage foreign manufactures." This the proprietor of the iron mines in the interior of Pennsylvania calls "a plain practical view of things as they should be." In reply to which your memorialists respectfully ask permission to present a concise view of things as they are.

In the first place, money, to any considerable amount, is not sent out of the country to purchase iron. Ships employed in the Russian trade take from the United States to different pôrts in Europe fish, rice, and the cheaper kinds of ardent spirits, such as New England rum, whisky, &c., and bring back cargoes of hemp and iron. Thus the labor of the fisherman results in the production of the substantial articles of bar-iron; and, in this way, a given quantum of labor produces to the country a much larger quantity of iron than could be produced by the same quantum of labor applied directly to working the ores of our own country. Suppose the fisherman to be equally as skillful and expert in making bar-iron as he is in taking fish; even in that case he could catch as many fish in one day as would pay a Russian or a Swede for as much iron as he could himself make in three days. Under these circumstances, can it be a wise regulation which shall compel the fisherman to relinquish his occupation and go to making iron in Pennsylvania in order that he may drink up the surplus whisky which is made there, instead of exchanging whisky and fish for iron and hemp, especially when it is considered that the exchange will produce to the country at least three times the quantity of iron that could be produced by the labor of the fisherman aided by the strength of the whisky?"

Mr. Chairman, I come now to a memorable document, exceeded by none in sound logic—a remonstrance adopted at a meeting in Boston, composed of merchants and agriculturists, on the 17th of August, 1824, which was presented to the Eighteenth Congress, from which I will read a few extracts (Annals Congress, pages 3086 and 3087, Eighteenth Congress, first session):

The price of manufactures involves the cost of the raw material, the sum paid the owner of the capital employed in working it, and the wages of the workmen. It is when the last are greatest in proportion to the whole price that industry is best paid and most encouraged.

Machines for multiplying the effects of labor may indeed produce a great profit, but it accrues to the owners of them, not to those employed in managing them. Should any one construct a machine so perfect that it would enable a single hand by merely turning a crank to supply the country with broadcloth, the possessor of this curious piece of mechanism would certainly make a fortune; but the laborer who put it in motion would receive not a cent more than the regular wages for turning a crank. The occupations in which money is laid out for complicated machinery for lands, buildings, and fixtures, to accumulate the raw material, or the means of converting it to use, or keep on hand a great quantity of the articles manufactured, so as to dispose of them most beneficially in the market, may afford a profitable investment for capital, but have no exclusive or peculiar tendency to increase the price or the amount of labor. The factory at Waltham tends to raise wages no more than every other establishment, however small its capital, which employs the same number of hands; and it is difficult to conceive a case in which industry or its reward can be increased by turning any number of men from one pursuit to another. The machines and implements for the aid of labor, which can be profitably employed with a very small capital, such as the tools of the mechanic, are most useful to the poor; those which require a large capital, to the rich. The former tend to diffuse wealth, the latter to concentrate it. Which is the most consonant to our institutions and character?

BOSTON RESOLUTIONS, DRAWN BY DANIEL WEBSTER.

I will now read the resolutions adopted by that celebrated meeting and presented to Congress, and I invite the attention especially of the members from Massachusetts and the whole committee. They were drawn and the memorial written by that great man Daniel Webster, and presented by him to Congress:

Resolved, That we have regarded with pleasure the establishment and success of manufactures among us, and consider their growth when natural and spontaneous, and not the effect of a system of bounties and protection, as an evidence of general wealth and prosperity.

Resolved, That, relying on the ingenuity, enterprise, and skill of our fellow-citizens, we believe that all manufactures adapted to our character and circumstances will be introduced and extended as soon and as far as will promote the public interest without any further protection than they now receive.

Resolved, That no objection ought ever to be made to any amount of taxes equally apportioned and imposed for the purpose of raising revenue necessary for the support of Government, but that taxes imposed on the people for the sole benefit of any one class of men are equally inconsistent with the principles of our Constitution and with sound policy.

Resolved, That the supposition that until the proposed tariff or some similar measure be adopted we are and shall be dependent on foreigners for the means of subsistence and defense is in our opinion altogether fallacious and fanciful and derogatory to the character of the nation.

Resolved, That high bounties on such domestic manufactures as are principally benefited by that tariff favor great capitalists rather than personal industry or the owners of small capitals, and therefore that we do not perceive its tendency to promote national industry.

Resolved, That we are equally incapable of discovering its beneficial effects on agriculture, since the obvious consequence of its adoption would be that the farmer must give more than he now does for all he buys and receive less for all he sells.

Resolved, That the imposition of duties which are enormous and deemed by a large portion of the people to be unequal and unjust is dangerous, as it encourages the practice of smuggling.

Resolved, That in our opinion the proposed tariff and the principles on which it is avowedly founded would, if adopted, have a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that gentlemen on the other side will say that Mr. Webster changed his opinions afterward; but let us look at the facts. In 1820 the convention met and adopted these resolutions drawn by Daniel Webster, and they were presented to Congress. After a lapse of four years, in 1824, they held another convention, and after mature deliberation the convention, one of whom was Daniel Webster, readopted the same memorial and resolutions, and Mr. Webster presented them in 1824. The constitutional provisions and the eternal principles of justice upon which these resolutions were based had not changed from 1820 to 1824, and, sir, candor must force every fair-minded man to admit that they have not changed yet. They were true then, framed by the greatest constitutional lawyer that this country ever produced, and reaffirmed by him four years afterward in one of the ablest speeches he ever made in the United States Senate, in which he used this language in regard to what was the true American policy. I commend this especially to my Republican friends on this floor who talk so much about the "American policy."

Mr. Webster said:

Sir, that is the truest American policy which shall most usefully employ American capital and American labor and best sustain the whole population. With me it is a fundamental axiom, it is interwoven with all my opinions, that the great interests of the country are united and inseparable; that agriculture, commerce, and manufactures will prosper together or languish together; and that all legislation is dangerous which proposes to benefit one of these without looking to consequences which may fall on the other.

And in regard to protecting "American industry" this is what Mr. Webster said, from which it will be seen that he did not regard manufactures as the only "American industry."

Mr. Webster said:

Gentlemen tell us that they are in favor of domestic industry; so am I. They would give it protection; so would I. But then all domestic industry is not confined to manufactures. The employments of agriculture, commerce, and navigation are all branches of the same domestic industry; they all furnish employment for American capital and American labor.

These resolutions and his speech stand to-day recorded in the archives of this Government as monumental evidence of the justice and patriotism of the great mind that drew them—as a beacon-light to guide future generations—and are as true and as forcible as the day they were drawn. And I deny that Mr. Webster ever did change his opinions in regard to these resolutions, for in a debate in the United States Senate as late as 1846, with Mr. McDuffie, Mr. Webster said:

Take it in the broadest sense, and I agree to every word of the resolutions of Faneuil Hall of 1821.

And the resolutions of Faneuil Hall are the ones I have just read.

Mr. Chairman, frequent reference has been made to Mr. Jefferson, General Jackson, and other Democrats, but no Democratic President ever advocated such a tariff as we have to-day or recognized the principles contended for by the protectionists; and Mr. Clay, of my State, to whom frequent reference has been made in this debate, never advocated such a monstrosity as this tariff, forced upon us in the excitement of a civil war under a false pretense of filling the Treasury, and continued with increased duties by the conference committee at the last session of Congress. Mr. Clay only advocated a tariff of 20 per cent., to be kept up for a few years to foster manufactories in their infancy. They have grown up to manhood, and, as I said before, the broad ocean across which most of the raw material has to be transported and then brought back to this country gives all the protection these manufacturers ought to have.

Mr. Chairman, I have read these extracts from the protests of Eastern States and refrain from reading any from the Southern States, although they were equally conclusive in the argument against a protective tariff, because I wanted to show that these very States that are now trying to rivet this system, unjust as it is, on the consumers of this great country, and which is especially unjust and oppressive upon the West and South, were at one time, when they were impartial judges, opposed to this system, and that these representatives and memorialists used arguments that were unanswerable against this system; that, too, when the tariff was only 20 per cent. and on fewer articles, and the present tariff 40 per cent. or over. But now, sir, because their interests have changed, they attempt to ridicule these very arguments and deny the facts upon which they are based, because they can not refute them or successfully answer them. These arguments are as true to-day as they were in 1820 and 1824, and apply with more force, as I have said before. We have lived to see the predictions of those pure patriots, who opposed this unjust system and who foresaw its ruinous consequences when once fastened on the country, verified after half a century of protection, after receiving countless millions from the farmers and laborers of this country and other consumers, after growing in power and wealth; yet they are not willing to let go their hold, but are determined to oppress the great majority of the people with a tariff system far more unjust and onerous upon the people than the tariffs that they denounced and protested against in 1820 and 1824.

Mr. Chairman, I hope to see the day when the tariff taxation will be reduced to an amount only sufficient to defray the expenses of the Government economically administered, and hope this Congress will reduce it certainly as low as is proposed by the Morrison bill. I would vote to reduce it to a revenue standard, because it is right and just. The people have paid tribute long enough, and I see no wisdom in only giving partial relief from a system which we denounce as wrong and unconstitutional.

Mr. Chairman, I will close my remarks by reading an extract from the speech of our able Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK], delivered a few days ago in the Senate, in which he comments upon the conference report by virtue of which this present odious and unjust system of tariff taxation has been enacted into a law. It ought to be read by every man in the land, and especially by every Democrat. Mr. BECK said, referring to the conference report:

It was the most shameless combination to override and disregard the rights and interests of the people that was ever successfully perpetrated. Yet the perpetrators of these wrongs have the audacity now to denounce all attempts to modify or repeal any of the burdens they, not Congress, imposed upon the country under such circumstances. I hope the Democratic party will accept the issue they tender, and lay bare their conduct in every nook and corner of the land. That done, there will be an end of such legislation, and new men will fill the places of the perpetrators of that great wrong in these Halls.

* * * * * * *

I say their conferees, because the report they made was infinitely more oppressive on the people wherever they made changes than the Senate bill was, and in many important regards far more so than the partial action of the House warranted upon the schedules on which it had acted. It increased the burdens of taxation largely on important classes of goods when there were no disagreeing votes between the two Houses, indeed when both had agreed to lower rates. It added new paragraphs with increased rates of taxation to both the woolen and cotton schedules that neither House had ever seen or heard of: it increased taxation on many articles of prime necessity to the poorest of our people even beyond the highest war rates.

In short, that conference committee violated every principle of law, justice, and precedent, and now they and their partisans make the issue before the country that all the outrages it was guilty of shall be sustained and approved. The Democratic party has accepted that issue. We denounced it in both Houses at the time. We are seeking now to modify if we can not undo the wrongs they committed. We will appeal to the people if we fail here. It is, I repeat, the great overshadowing issue of the opening campaign. It will not down at anybody's bidding. No flank movements on Danville riots, Copiah murders, Tewksbury horrors, or Cincinnati riots or "Burkings" will divert the American people from passing upon the injustice and the wrong both of the matter and the manner of the legislation of March 3, 1883, which we will insist and prove was not imposed upon the country in any proper sense by Congress, or either branch of it, but against the known will of both branches by a conference committee acting in the interest of protected monopolists, and in utter disregard of the rights and interests of the people. I know that the protectionists derive great comfort from our apparent hesitation and division. Of course we will have some stragglers, but we will get ten recruits for each straggler, and they will enlist for the war. Does any one suppose that any Democratic constituency will indorse any man who supports, maintains, or defends the work of that conference committee and avows his determination to perpetuate the oppressive burdens it has imposed and seeks to fasten upon the country? Or that the Democratic national convention will fail to denounce the policy and practice of these oppressors? Or that we either can or ought to shrink from the responsibility of meeting that issue? Or that we can decently ask the people to turn the dominant party out of power if we propose to continue their policy, or if we dare not say we oppose it? The people despise hypocrisy, and they ought to.

If the protectionists are to be sustained in their subsidies, obtained and retained by false pretenses and revolutionary proceedings, let it be done after an open, honest, manly resistance. Sneaks and cowards never command respect. If there are Democrats who sustain that "conference bill" and its taxation, let them so vote and avow. We can stand defeat in a good cause, with justice and right on our side. Our principles may be crushed to earth; they will rise again and rise with renewed strength.

Mr. DINGLEY addressed the committee. When he had spoken for forty-five minutes,

Mr. MORRISON said: If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] will yield to me I will move that the committee rise, and the gentleman will have an opportunity of concluding his remarks to-morrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN [Mr. TOWNSHEND]. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. DINGLEY. I yield for a motion that the committee rise, with the understanding that I will conclude my remarks to-morrow.

The motion that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNSHEND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DR. MARCUS WHITMAN.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to the massacre of Marcus Whitman, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of April 3; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MILLE LAC RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relative to Mille Lac reservation, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of March 21; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FORNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6861) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. REED. It is understood that all points of order are reserved on the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] reserves all points of order on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. REED. I should like to inquire whether the Chair has come to the conclusion that it is necessary to reserve such points?

The SPEAKER. That is a question the Speaker is not required to decide, because the question as to points of order comes up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I will say in answer to the gentleman from Maine, and I think it is appropriate for me to say, that a practice has grown up by which these points of order are reserved. So far as my knowledge of the rules goes, it seems to me the right to make the point of order when the question is actually before the committee is as strong then as it can be made strong by a prior reservation of the right.

Mr. REED. I am very glad to hear the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER. That has also been the opinion of the Chair, though no occasion has ever arisen, in the recollection of the Chair, to decide the question.

Mr. SPRINGER. And I differ with the Speaker and also the ex-Speaker upon that question. It will be found by an examination of parliamentary authorities, that points of order must be reserved at the time the bill is reported from the committee.

The SPEAKER. At all events the question is not material now, all points of order having been reserved by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

ELIZA A. MOSES.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6862) granting a pension to Eliza A. Moses; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

FORT SMITH AND PINE BLUFF HARBOR.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. It is a resolution of inquiry which was referred to the committee.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to furnish at once to this House any information he has received from the engineer in charge of changes that have taken place since the last official report to Congress and that are taking place in the harbors of Fort Smith and Pine Bluff, Arkansas, including threatened cut-offs and the erosion of the banks of the harbors.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARY J. MAGEE.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 6863) for the relief of Mary J. Magee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] will preside at the evening session as Speaker pro tempore. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, in pursuance of the previous order of the House the Chair declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. ADAMS, of New York, in the chair.

TARIFF REDUCTION.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole, for debate only, on the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes.

Mr. WINANS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time I shall occupy in this debate I will state my reasons for favoring the bill under consideration, but shall not enter upon a discussion of the merits or demerits of protection as a system.

As to whether it is a good system or a bad system there is the same diversity of opinion among the people I have the honor to represent upon this floor that there is in other sections of our country. With free trade would necessarily come direct taxation, and with our large public debts and pension-list likely to be increased I know of no considerable public sentiment anywhere favoring the latter.

The bill we are considering is not framed in the interest either of protection or free trade, but is presented and urged to avoid this accumulation of an unneeded surplus in the national Treasury, and as an act of simple justice to the tax-payers of the country.

When the proposition was before us to restore the duty on wool to where it was before the last revision of the tariff I voted for it in the belief that its reduction was unjust to the growers and had not resulted in reducing the price of woolen goods, but was just so much taken from the farmers and given to the manufacturers.

I believe, sir, that so long as protection is given to the manufacturers it should also be given to our farmers. In other words, I wanted the duty restored and then scaled down 20 per cent. with all other articles of importation under this bill. That having failed, in my opinion wool should be exempted from the operations of this, and in this way the same thing accomplished.

Mr. Chairman, I think I am safe in saying there is a decided majority in the West, however it may be elsewhere, who favor a reduction of taxation, who demand that taxation shall be limited to the needs of the Government economically administered. And, sir, I know of no sentiment that would authorize Congress to remove the tax from whisky and tobacco, and hence the only way by which a surplus can be avoided is by reducing our high protective duties.

A large surplus in the Treasury is not only a wrong to the tax-payers of our country, but has been regarded as an evil, and as such dangerous, leading to waste and extravagance, if not to jobbery and corruption. I am, sir, in favor of this bill as the only means by which injustice to the tax-payers and danger to the Government can be avoided. By it taxes will be lessened, the necessaries of life cheapened, and our industries still be amply protected.

Sir, this is a measure upon which the voters in my district have spoken in no uncertain terms, and I am but voicing their views and their wishes.

The bill under consideration may not be the best that could have been devised, but no other has been presented, and it is it or nothing at this session of Congress. We hear from day to day upon this floor the statements that the national Treasury is full to overflowing, having now a surplus, I believe, of about $150,000,000. And because of this large surplus all sorts of schemes are devised, I will not say inside, but outside of Congress to despoil it of this surplus, and find their way here, and we are asked, nay, urged, to give them our support.

The high protectionists naturally want some way devised to absorb the surplus, in order that present duties may be continued. As a consequence our annual river and harbor bills are increasing; salaries of judges and clerks are being increased; educational bills are proposed; new bureaus, offices, and officers are being created; costly public buildings in many Congressional districts are being erected, and in a thousand other ways the money is being taken that should remain in the Treasury, or, better still, left with the people from whom it is taken by excessive and burdensome taxations.

Sir, let us not only reduce taxation, but let us guard our surplus now on hand and apply it to the payment of the 3 per cent. bonds, $254,000,000 of which are now payable, and save interest. Why waste it upon creeks and rivers and harbors unknown to commerce? Why give it to sections, to corporations, or to individuals? Why raise a surplus and then distribute it unequally among the States?

Sir, I believe the adoption of this bill will stop waste and extravagance, as I know it will reduce taxation and give to the people a rest long needed by them.

Let us, sir, surprise the country by an honest effort to economize our expenditures and by reducing taxation to the actual needs of the Government economically administered, and see if our every act in this direction will not be appreciated and applauded by the people we represent.

Mr. Chairman, I am especially pleased with that feature of the bill which places lumber, fuel, and salt on the free-list, and I would like to see sugar added, on which the people are now paying nearly or quite $50,000,000 annually.

These are articles that need no protection. The owners of our hard wood and pine forests in the West and Northwest are our money kings and are among our monopolists. They have acquired the lands largely at Government prices, and by combinations have controlled the markets and compelled purchasers, especially the smaller ones, to pay exorbitant prices. Why keep from our markets Canadian lumber, which if admitted free of duty would, to some extent, compete and cheapen prices? Is it not a policy that enriches the few at the expense of the many?

Why continue a policy that is fast leading to the destruction of our forests, is affecting all our streams and water ways, and will, at no distant day, place us at the mercy of Canada for our lumber? Why continue a policy to counteract which Congress has deemed it necessary to stimulate by bounties the growth upon our prairies of the very thing being so largely and rapidly destroyed?

Sir, if this Congress shall do nothing else than make this bill a law, thereby giving to the laboring classes of this country cheaper lumber, cheaper fuel, cheaper sugar and salt, and cheaper clothing, it will have earned their everlasting gratitude. All this and much more can, in my judgment, be done without reducing the price of labor, and at the same time increase the purchasing power of the earnings of the laborer. All this can be done without doing injustice to the manufacturers of our country, as they will still have all the protection needed, and all, if not more, than they can reasonably demand at the expense of the great mass of people.

Mr. Chairman, in order to obey the behests of the people I have the honor to represent here I must vote for this bill. They have declared in favor of reducing taxation to the lowest limit consistent with the payment of the just obligations of the Government, including liberal pensions to those who in time of its peril saved and secured to the nation its life. Nay, more; they have insisted that every dollar of surplus in the national Treasury shall be applied to the payment of the public debt. And they have required and I am pledged to the support of the administration in all its measures looking to economy and reform. This I regard as such a measure, and as such has been recommended by Secretary Folger and by the President in communications to Congress. I will here call attention to what they have said upon this subject in justification of this or a similar measure of relief.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last report, speaking of the Tariff Commission, quotes the following from their report:

> Early in its deliberations the commission became convinced that a substantial reduction of tariff duties is demanded, not by mere indiscriminate popular clamor but by the best conservative opinion of the country, including that which has in former times been most strenuous for the preservation of our national industrial defenses. Such a reduction of the existing tariff the commission regards as not only a due recognition of public sentiment and a measure of justice to consumers but one conducive to the general industrial prosperity, and which, though it may be temporarily inconvenient, will be ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction.

Again—

> Entertaining these views, the commission has sought to prevent a scheme of tariff duties in which substantial reduction should be the distinguishing feature. The average reduction in rates, including that from the enlargement of the free-list and the abolition of the duties on charges and commissions, at which the commission has aimed, is not less on the average than 20 per cent., and it is the opinion of the commission that the reduction will reach 25 per cent.

The Secretary, speaking from the official records, proceeds to say:

> The chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, in explanation of the bill before the Senate last year, which after various amendments became a law, estimated at $45,000,000 the reduction of the revenue which would follow the changes in the tariff proposed thereby. These intentions and calculations have not been verified.

The Secretary adds:

> There was general agreement that a substantial reduction of the tariff should be made. The estimates of the Tariff Commission and of the Senate committee show what was the contemplated reduction. The actual results so far obtained indicate that the reduction labored for has not been effected by the new tariff act. It is to be considered, too, that the failure is not to be charged to the increase of importations keeping up the amount of customs revenue. The statistics of our foreign commerce show that there has not been an increase chargeable thereto.
> In the report of this Department last year the reduction as applied to the principal classes of dutiable articles was considered somewhat in detail, and, adhering to the views there expressed, a repetition of them is unnecessary.

In the former report to which the Secretary refers he says:

> In reading the testimony before the Tariff Commission it is to be observed that with scarcely an exception the representative of every industry, while conceding that a general reduction of the tariff is proper and necessary, has claimed that its peculiar product can submit to no reduction of the protection now afforded. While the views of the manufacturers are to be weighed, it is manifest that they will never be able to agree upon a reduction of the tariff duties.

Again, he says:

> The classes of merchandise paying the largest amount of duties from customs are the following, in the order named: Sugar and molasses, wool and manufactures from it, iron and steel and the manufactures from them, manufactures of silk, manufactures of cotton, amounting to about one hundred and thirty-seven and a half millions. A substantial reduction upon each of the class of articles named is recommended. And it is believed that the time has arrived when a reduction of duties on nearly all the articles in our tariff is demanded and is feasible.
> * * * * * * *
> The cotton tariff is found complex and inconsistent, and it is no doubt true that in most of the coarser classes of cotton fabrics our manufacturers can compete with the world without protection.

The President, in his message in December, 1882, had been equally emphatic in his demands for the reduction of tariff taxation. He fully indorses the Secretary of the Treasury, saying:

> I heartily approve the Secretary's recommendation of immediate and extensive reductions in the annual revenues of the Government. It will be remembered that I urged upon the attention of Congress at its last session the importance of relieving the industry and enterprise from the pressure of unnecessary taxation. It is one of the tritest maxims of political economy that all taxes are burdensome, however wisely and prudently imposed. And though there have always been among our people wide differences of sentiment as to the best methods of raising the national revenues, and indeed as to the principles upon which taxation should be based, there has been substantial accord in the doctrine that only such taxes ought to be levied as are necessary for a wise and economical administration of the Government. Of late the public revenues have far exceeded that limit, and unless checked by appropriate legislation such excesses will continue to increase from year to year. For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1881, the surplus revenue amounted to $100,000,000; for the fiscal year ended 30th of June last the surplus was more than $145,000,000. The report of the Secretary shows what disposition has been made of these moneys. They have not only answered the requirements of the sinking fund, but have afforded a large balance applicable to other reductions of the public debt.
> Either the surplus must lie idle in the Treasury, or the Government will be forced to buy, at market rates, its bonds not then redeemable, and which, under such circumstances, can not fail to command an enormous premium, or the swollen revenues will be devoted to extravagant expenditure, which, as experience has taught, is ever the bane of an overflowing treasury.
> It was made apparent, in the course of the animated discussions which this question aroused at the last session of Congress, that the policy of diminishing the revenue by reducing taxation commanded the general approval of the members of both Houses. I regret that because of conflicting views, as to the best methods by which that policy should be made operative, none of its benefits have as yet been reaped.

It is seen, sir, from what I have just read, that the Tariff Commission, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the President have severally recommended to Congress and to the country a revision of the tariff, and have said that such reduction would be a "due recognition of public sentiment," would be "a measure of justice to consumers," would "be conducive to the general industrial prosperity of the country," and would be "ultimately beneficial to the special interests affected by such reduction."

And so, Mr. Chairman, the Forty-seventh Congress regarded it, or affected to regard it, and revised the tariff, claiming its revision would reduce taxation at least forty-five millions annually. But, sir, it is now well known that its revision has failed to make any considerable reduction, and the reasons then assigned, and justly assigned, for its reduction still exist—in fact are more urgent and pressing now than then.

Mr. Chairman, I am the friend of American industry, and am the friend of the laboring poor, and would not knowingly do anything to cripple the one or injure the other; but, sir, I believe this bill to be in the interest of each and both. And, in conclusion, I submit that if the Tariff Commission was right, if Secretary Folger was right, and if the President was right in recommending a reduction of duties 20 to 25 per cent. "as a measure of justice to consumers," as a "measure in recognition of public sentiment," and as a measure of "relief to the industry and enterprise of the country from the pressure of unnecessary taxation," then the friends of this bill are right, and it should receive the sanction of the American Congress.

> Yes, men of toil, you may well be sure
> They who oppose this bill love not the poor.

Mr. MORRISON. There does not seem to be any other gentleman who desires to speak to-night. I move, therefore, that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. McMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. ADAMS, of New York, reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5893) to reduce import duties and war-tariff taxes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 30, 1884.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 20th ultimo, a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions relative to the return of the rolls of Revolutionary soldiers belonging to any of the States which are now in the possession of the United States; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter, with the accompanying report, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, if there be no objection.

Mr. CULLOM. I thought from the reading of the communication that it refers to pensions. Does it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It relates to the return of Revolutionary muster-rolls. The Chair will refer it to the Committee on Pensions if the Senator from Illinois desires.

Mr. CULLOM. I do not desire to have it referred to that committee unless it refers to pensions proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It refers to the military muster-rolls of Revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. CULLOM. Then let the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of A. B. Fox Post, No. 175, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Nebraska, praying for certain pension legislation; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Hambright Post, No. 270, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, and a petition of Burnett Post, No. 183, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Indiana, praying for the passage of certain laws relating to pensions; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DOLPH presented resolutions adopted by Burnside Post, No. 23, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Oregon, Ashland, Oreg., in favor of certain pension legislation; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PALMER presented the petition of Mrs. Livinia Robinson, mother of Alfred W. Robinson, late a teamster in the United States Army, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Nahum Gilbert and other citizens of Allegan, Mich., praying for an increase of pension to William S. Pardee, late private Company C, One hundred and twenty-ninth Indiana Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL presented the memorial of Guy, Kimball & Gay, William L. Saunders, W. A. Patrick, and other citizens of Rutland, Vt., and of E. B. Kimball and other citizens of Gaysville, Vt., remonstrating against the proposed repeal of the present patent laws; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Wallace F. Robinson and other members of the Boston Produce Exchange, of Boston, Mass., praying for additional mail facilities; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 351) authorizing the muster-in and discharge of Henry Z. Blinn; and

A bill (S. 1921) authorizing the Secretary of War to adjust and settle the account for arms, ammunition and accouterments between the Territory of Montana and the United States.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William N. Berkeley, of Alexandria, Va., praying to be paid for church property destroyed by United States troops, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. GEORGE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas P. Morgan, jr., praying the payment of a certain amount of money alleged to have been earned under his contract for dredging in Norfolk Harbor, Virginia, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. 2132) for the relief of Thomas P. Morgan, jr.; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2055) for the relief of Basil Moreland, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 864) for the relief of William G. Ford, administrator of John G. Robinson, deceased, have carefully considered the same, and in accordance with the resolution of the Senate of February 7, 1884, report as follows:

That they have referred the same to the Court of Claims under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," approved March 3, 1883.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 171) for the relief of J. W. Bowling and J. S. Gollady; and

A bill (S. 1270) for the benefit of Mrs. Mary H. Chawning.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Susan A. Shelby, praying compensation for cotton alleged to have been taken, captured, or sold by the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 688) for the relief of Alexander K. Shepard, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 235) to print additional copies of certain publications, reported it without amendment.

THE HERNDON EULOGIES.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress, to report it without amendment. If there be no objection I should like to have the resolution passed. It is a mere matter of form, and might as well be disposed of at once.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. Res. 240) to print 12,500 copies of eulogies on Thomas H. Herndon, late a Representative in Congress, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 2133) granting a pension to Caroline E. French; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2134) for the relief of William C. Spencer; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. LAPHAM, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Thomas H. Lawrence, late a second lieutenant in the United States revenue-marine service, be taken from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be directed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to distribute to libraries designated for the reception of public documents under chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes, one copy each of the Statutes at Large and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD hereafter to be published, and to report its conclusion by bill or otherwise.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 767) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 179) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint from the sergeants of the Signal Corps two second lieutenants; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 209) granting the use of cannon, tents, and muskets to ex-Union soldiers for reunion purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 5966) to change the name of the Marsh National Bank of Lincoln, Nebr., to that of the Capital National Bank of Lincoln, and to increase the capital stock of the First National Bank of Nashville, Tenn.; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 223) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the mayor of Richmond, Va., a certain amount of flags and bunting for use at a fair.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM PERINE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the Calendar under Rule VIII, beginning with Order of Business 260, being Senate bill 1240.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1240) for the relief of Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased.

Mr. PLATT. I should like to have the bill read once more.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, having been read hitherto as in Committee of the Whole.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Sarah E. E. Perine, administratrix of the estate of William Perine, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $132,493.23, being the amount due to William Perine, as found by the Selfridge board, for building the light-draught monitor Naubuc and the iron tug-boats Triana and Maria.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, as I said yesterday when I objected to the consideration of the bill, the history of this claim can not be stated in five minutes, but I think within five minutes' time I can show enough to satisfy the Senate that this bill ought not to pass without further examination by the Senate or by the committee which reported it.

The bill represents one of a class of claims which were known as the claims of the ironclad contractors. In 1865 some forty or more contractors of gunboats and other vessels during the war applied to be paid extra compensation upon two grounds, one that the price of materials had advanced upon their hands during the progress of the work, and the other that the Government had changed the plans and had delayed them in the construction. The result was that Congress passed an act under which the Secretary of the Navy established a board for the examination of those claims, which was called the Selfridge board. The Selfridge board examined the claims and among others reported that it had cost William Perine to construct three vessels the amount specified in this bill; but that was solely for the reason that the materials had advanced in price after he took his contract.

Upon that report being submitted to Congress a bill was introduced to pay the contractors the amounts reported. That bill was cut down in the Senate by one-half the amount. It went to the House of Representatives and the House refused to pass the bill in that shape, but passed a bill sending all those claims to the Court of Claims, which received the concurrence of the Senate. That bill was vetoed by President Grant.

There had been previous to that time a new board organized under an act of Congress to ascertain how much of the amounts reported by the first board were the result of delay on the part of the Government or change of plan. That board reported in perhaps eight of the cases that certain amounts were the result of delay, but in the Perine case they reported that none of the claim was the result of delay on the part of the Government, and that the claim was entirely because materials had risen in price after the contract was taken.

Senators who have been here longer than I will remember that there was a good deal of scandal about the Secor claim, and the Secretary of the Navy was charged with having corruptly paid to the Secor firm $93,000. That matter was investigated at length. The Secor claim was one of these contractors' claims.

I have given this short history (concise as it must be when I can speak only five minutes) for the purpose of showing that this is a matter which has been settled in the Congress of the United States for thirteen years. Since General Grant vetoed the bill to send these claims to the Court of Claims not one claim has been paid of this class of claims. There was a prior payment of one of these claims, but since that time no claim has been paid of this sort. There are still outstanding against the Government claims of this precise nature which amount to more than $2,000,000. The payment of this claim acknowledges the duty of the Government to pay all of those claims, and therefore I insist that it ought not to be hurried through the Senate in this way.

I do not believe that the Government can adopt the principle of paying to every contractor under the Government all the money that he may have lost on his contract by reason of the fact that materials have advanced on his hands during the time within which he has been completing his contract. That is precisely the principle which is involved in this case. I can not believe that the committee——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOAR in the chair). The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired under the rule.

Mr. PLATT. I move to amend the bill by reducing the sum from $132,000 to $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut moves an amendment. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lines 7 and 8 of the bill it is proposed to strike out "$132,493.23" and to insert "$10,000."

Mr. PLATT. I think I can speak to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the Chair will recognize the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I can not believe that the Committee on Claims has investigated the entire history of this claim. The Committee on Claims put it entirely upon the report of the Selfridge board, as if that was the last action which had ever been taken by Congress or any board under the authority of Congress with reference to this claim. Since the Selfridge board, as I have already stated, there has been another board organized to say whether any of this $132,000 was the result of delay on the part of the Government. That board has reported that none of it grew out of delay on the part of the Government. That board was called the Marquand board. Some Senators may be able to remember it. But the committee in this report refer only to the Selfridge board.

The committee go on to state that one of these claims has been paid, the case of Donahue, Ryan & Secor, and that was paid in 1867. What the exact facts relating to that claim were I have not been able to ascertain, but I do know that it was a case which was in court at the time the board made their report, and therefore in that respect it differed from the other claims and from the claim which is now before the Senate. The precise reason for the payment of that claim I do not know; but since the payment of that claim, as I have already stated, a bill to submit these cases to the Court of Claims was passed and vetoed by General Grant.

The committee go on to say:

In addition, the following special acts have been passed to relieve contractors in similar cases, to wit:

Act of February 18, 1873, to relieve the heirs of George C. Bester, $125,000, 17 Stats., 733.

Act of June 1, 1872, to pay Charles W. Whitney $50,000, 17 Stats., 671.

Act of June 10, 1872, to pay J. S. Underhill $23,310.75, 17 Stats., 691.

Act of March 2, 1875, to pay Daniel S. Mershon, jr., $46,715.08, 18 Stats., 635.

But I desire to say of these claims that not one of them was included among the claims which went before these boards; they are different claims. This claim is one of the class of cases which was reported upon by these two boards, which has received time and time again the consideration of Congress, and which has been backed here by a powerful lobby, which a Secretary of the Navy in an investigation testified was the most powerful lobby he had ever known before Congress. The claims upon which reliance is placed in the report of the committee are an entirely different class of claims.

I can not believe that the Committee on Claims has been fully informed with relation to the history of these cases and the facts in regard to them.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Mr. President, this is one of a class of cases that since the commencement of my service in the Senate have been usually referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. I remember well four or five cases of like character which were referred to that committee, in the first place asking for a specific appropriation of money covering the amount the parties conceived the Government owed them. When they found the committee refused to take action upon the bills they wished that the claim might be referred to the Court of Claims in order that they might present their statement to the Court of Claims and get an award from that court.

The Committee on Naval Affairs up to this hour have refused to report to the Senate such a bill because it would be a confession that some money was due the claimants from the Government, when the facts are that not a single dollar is due. But on the application of these gentlemen with their supposed claims against the Government, two or three different boards have been appointed. First, the Selfridge board was appointed, which adjudicated every point of controversy between the claimants and the Government. The claimants receipted to the Government for everything due them. They gave a receipt in full of all debts, demands, and claims.

Afterward, and by what process I can not conceive, a new board was appointed, I think the Marquand board. They investigated the subjects which were again raised by the claimants. An award was made, if I recollect aright, which covered very largely the claims due for delay, the increased cost of material incident to and attendant upon the delay, &c., in the construction of the vessels. The claimants a second time receipted to the Government.

The Government holds to-day three receipts: the original receipt on the delivery of the property under the contract, the second receipt upon an adjusted claim, which covered every ground of controversy so far as the board were willing to allow it up to that time; and the third receipt covers everything that could possibly be resurrected in the shape of a claim on the part of the claimants.

These people are here again. A bill was introduced which has been reported back from the Committee on Claims making an award of one hundred and thirty-odd thousand dollars in this case upon exactly the same facts that two different boards of survey and adjudication appointed by the Government have completely and absolutely settled.

If it is in order to object to the consideration of this bill, so as to let it go on the Calendar where the proper discussion of the matter can be had, I object to its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey objects to the further consideration of the bill, and it goes over under the rule.

POTOMAC FREE BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1477) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Potomac River at the Three Sisters, near Georgetown, D. C., was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the understanding of yesterday, this bill goes over for one week, unless sooner called up by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

LOTTERY ADVERTISEMENTS.

The bill (S. 1017) to prohibit the mailing of newspapers and other publications containing lottery advertisements, and prescribing a penalty for the violation of the same, was announced as next in order upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill it was agreed should go over until the return of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON].

INDIANS ON UMATILLA RESERVATION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 66) providing for allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians residing upon the Umatilla reservation, in the State of Oregon, and granting patents therefor, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. It will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In section 3, line 10, after the word "draw," it is proposed to strike out the words "four per centum per annum interest," and to insert "such rate of interest as is now or may be hereafter provided by law;" so as to read:

That the funds arising from the sale of said reservation lands, after paying the expenses of survey, appraisement, and sale, and reimbursing any Indian or Indians for the value of any improvements belonging to such Indian or Indians, and the equitable share of any Indian to the funds arising from the sale of said reservation lands as herein provided, and reimbursing the United States for improvements made by the Government and under the provisions herein, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said Indians, and the same shall draw such rate of interest as is now or may be hereafter provided by law.

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES], the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, is engaged at this moment in the Committee on Appropriations. I have sent for him. He will be here in a moment. Unless it is very pressing I should prefer not to have action upon this amendment before he comes in. I left the committee-room a moment ago, saying that I would send for him if the bill came up. I do not know anything about the bill.

Mr. SLATER. Mr. President——

Mr. BECK. The Senator from Oregon I suppose understands it.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I will inquire of the Senator from Oregon what rate of interest is now provided by law?

Mr. SLATER. I understand that it is 5 per cent. on all Indian trust funds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ABBY P. ARNOLD.

The bill (S. 764) granting an increase of pension to Abby P. Arnold was announced as next in order.

Mr. CONGER. That is reported adversely. I suppose it will go over.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have that bill retain its place on the Calendar. It is a bill introduced by my colleague [Mr. ANTHONY].

Mr. CONGER. Let it go over, holding its place.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the bill will go over, holding its place on the Calendar, until the return of the senior Senator from Rhode Island.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT COMPLETION CEREMONIES.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask unanimous consent to call up the joint resolution reported yesterday in relation to the Washington Monument. I think there will be no objection to its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to take up Senate joint resolution 82.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. R. 82) in relation to ceremonies to be authorized upon the completion of the Washington Monument.

Mr. MORRILL. In line 4, after the words "five Senators," I move to amend by inserting the words "appointed by the President of the Senate," and after the words "eight Representatives," I move to insert the words "appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that a small appropriation is necessary to cover some incidental expenses, for even a cannon can not be fired with ammunition belonging to the United States without accounting for it, and if there is any powder burned it will have to be paid for.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CINNABAR AND CLARK'S FORK RAILROAD.

The bill (S. 1373) granting the right of way to the Cinnabar and Clark's Fork Railroad Company was announced as next in order.

Mr. HARRISON. That bill proposes to grant a right of way some forty miles in length through the Yellowstone National Park. I do not want to make an objection that will carry it off the Calendar under Rule VIII, but I ask that it may be passed over without prejudice until the Committee on Territories, which committee has been giving some consideration to this subject, may consider the question whether there is not some route which this road can take that will not invade the park. We shall have a meeting of that committee on Friday, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may retain its place on the Calendar and be passed over until our committee can look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOM. As I understand, the Committee on Railroads have no objection to that if the Committee on Territories will give it early consideration.

Mr. SAWYER. I was going to say that I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

CHRISTIAN KROPP'S ADMINISTRATOR.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1072) for the relief of Samuel B. Seat, administrator of Christian Kropp, deceased. It provides for the payment to Samuel B. Seat, of Montgomery County, Tennessee, of $933.72, to refund to Seat the amount hitherto paid by him in excess of what was actually due by him to the United States, and which he paid in satisfaction of an erroneous judgment.

Mr. PLATT. Is there a report?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is. The report will be read.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The report on that bill is very long. I think the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], who reported the bill, can in a very few minutes state the substance of the report, and that that will be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I do not ask for the reading of the report if some member of the committee will make an explanation.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, the facts in this case are about as follows: On the 17th of February, 1869, Thomas T. Carter, intending to be engaged in the business of a distiller in the vicinity of Clarksville, Tenn., entered into a bond to the United States in the sum of $5,000, with Thomas B. Harrison and Christian Kropp as sureties. In April, 1874, the United States commenced a suit upon said bond against Carter as principal and Harrison and Kropp as sureties. No service was had upon Carter, he having left the State, but service was had upon Kropp and Harrison, the sureties, in June or July, 1874. Thereafter Kropp died, and the claimant, Samuel B. Seat, was appointed administrator of his estate, and on the 8th of May, 1878, the suit was brought to trial in the United States district court for the middle district of Tennessee, and judgment obtained against the sureties, and in favor of the United States for $1,168.08. Execution was issued and the amount of the judgment was paid into court by the administrator of Kropp. It afterward appeared that while the amount for which the judgment was rendered was the amount of taxes legally due from Carter, Kropp had not been surety of Carter at the time when all the taxes accrued, and that the judgment was erroneous to the extent of $933.72. The administrator, Seat, thereupon made an application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for relief under section 3220 of the Revised Statutes, which authorized the Commissioner, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, on appeal being made to him, to remit, refund, and pay back all taxes erroneously or illegally assessed or collected. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue rightfully thought that inasmuch as the money had been paid upon a judgment he was not authorized to pay it back upon the application, and so notified the applicant. Thereupon the attorney of Seat wrote to the collector asking whether, if the court which rendered the judgment would correct it, upon application made, he, the Commissioner, would thereupon refund the money under the provisions of this statute. The Commissioner answered in substance that if such a correction of the judgment should be made the claim for refunding the money would be considered; and also wrote to the district attorney in regard to the matter. Application was made to the court and the judgment was corrected. The recital of the record of the proceedings shows that the court determined that the judgment was erroneous to the extent of the $933 72. Thereupon the application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was renewed, and he, supposing that he now had authority to refund the money, made out a voucher for that purpose and submitted it to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Judge French, approved the repayment of the amount, and the claim so allowed was stated by the Fifth Auditor. When it came to the First Comptroller of the Treasury he refused to allow it.

Thereupon a suit was brought in the Court of Claims, and that court decided that the court in correcting the judgment had acted without authority, without jurisdiction, two years having elapsed since the judgment was rendered; that the power of the court to amend the judgment was gone after the term at which the judgment was rendered had expired, and that it was not competent for the district attorney to consent to the amendment of the judgment even when directed to do so by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and that inasmuch as the court had acted without jurisdiction the judgment was still in force and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue had no authority under the statute to repay the money, and that the Court of Claims had no jurisdiction to render a judgment in favor of the claimant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that his time has expired.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall be through in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Senator will proceed. The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOLPH. It therefore clearly appears that the judgment rendered against the claimant was rendered for too large a sum by mistake, and that the claimant being the administrator of Kropp and coming into the case just before the trial was not familiar with the facts, and a proper defense was not made, and the committee say that "by the excusable inadvertence of the claimant the judgment rendered in the district court of the United States for the middle district of Tennessee, on May 8, 1878, in favor of the United States, and against the claimant as administrator of Christian Kropp, was erroneous to the extent of $933.78," and that the amount should be refunded to him.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to ask the Senator how long after the entering of the judgment was it before this petitioner commenced his proceedings to have it corrected?

Mr. DOLPH. It was very soon after.

Mr. WILSON. I understood the Senator to say that some two years had expired.

Mr. DOLPH. It was the 19th of February, 1880, and the money was paid on the 9th of July, 1878, but two years had elapsed before the court that rendered the judgment undertook to correct it. The order of the court attempting to correct the judgment shows conclusively that the original judgment was entered by mistake. The United States having received the money and it being in the Treasury, the committee thought it ought to be refunded, and we ought not to hold that the judgment was conclusive upon Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT WHARF AT WILMINGTON, N. C.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1251) to authorize the purchase of a wharf for the use of the Government in Wilmington, N. C. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause an examination to be made of the wharf in front of the custom-house and other property at the port of Wilmington, N. C., offered by E. E. Burress, president of the First National Bank of Wilmington, and on inquiry as to the necessity of the use of the property described for the revenue-marine service and other customs purposes at that port, and if it shall be found advantageous and necessary for such purposes, to purchase the same at a reasonable price, not exceeding $30,000.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Upon the letter of the Department accompanying the papers in this case and upon the statement from the Department the committee were unanimously of the opinion that the bill should be reported favorably.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGES ACROSS WILLAMETTE RIVER.

The bill (S. 820) to authorize the Oregon Pacific Railroad Company to construct one or more bridges across the Willamette River, in the State of Oregon, and to establish them as post-roads, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 2, line 3, after the word "draw-bridge" to strike out "or other form of draw;" so as to read:

That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of said railway company, be built as a draw-bridge, or with unbroken or continuous spans.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 16, after the word "of," to insert "such width as the Secretary of War shall determine, and which shall be;" so as to read:
